I was about remarking, Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted, that the proposition which has been made, and which is now before the House, is that these grants of alternate sections of public lands are calculated to increase the value of the remaining lands. Objection has already been made to that proposition; but let us look at it for a moment, and what does it amount to?

If the construction of railroads increase the value of the public lands remaining in the hands of the people of the United States, would it not be wise for the Government to construct these roads herself, and so obtain all the increased value of the lands? If it is legitimate for this Government to obtain these lands, and to hold them for the purpose of speculation, would it not be wise and prudent for her to still hold and sell them in small quantities, and for the Government Treasury to make appropriations in money for the aid of these railroads?

In addition to this, let us examine this policy for a few moments, and what does it amount to? It must be admitted that if the Government has a right in this way to improve the public lands, for the purpose of increasing their value, and of thus increasing the wealth of the country, then, on the same principle, she would have a right to go into these lands by the assent of the General Government and cultivate them. Because if there is anything that will improve the value of the lands, it must be, above all things else, the hand of the industrious man, who enters, and tills, and cultivates it. On the same principle, I say, that we would make grant of alternate sections to enhance the value of the remaining lands, so we should cultivate and improve the lands. Just look where this policy is leading us; look at what we are going to in our pursuit of it.

This policy of making grants of the public lands for railroads is one of the most objectionable systems of internal improvement that has ever been decided on under this Government. It is a system without limits, without restriction, with no boundaries to it. As my friend justly remarked on the floor, a few moments ago, let us examine first, and ascertain whether we have land sufficient now to supply the demands that are made upon this Government. What would be the effect if it should turn out that we had not? Suppose we go on and pass bills granting public lands, without examination, and without looking at the results, and suppose that the Government finds when it comes to surrender possession of the lands for which it has made donations, that we have not lands enough left, will not these men to whom donations may be made come in and ask to be remunerated for the lands donated to them, but which they did not get possession of? Will they not have a legal claim on the Treasury of the Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am just told by a friend at my side that there is at present a bill before us for remuneration for a grant of land which has not been delivered over to the grantee.

Mr. LETCHER. Yes; a bill of that sort came in here the other day.

Mr. SKELTON. A bill to that effect has been just reported from the Senate. Because some persons go in and settle on these swamp lands before they get into the possession of the person to whom they were donated, the grantee comes and asks the Government to indemnify him for the value of the lands granted to him, but which he did not procure the possession of.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If that be so, I think the bill a very unjust one. I did not know anything about it until told by my friend.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. It is a correct bill, if it be the one introduced last session, that is alluded to.

Mr. SKELTON. I have another objection to these donations. It is, sir, that we are not only disposing of the public lands in a manner which is unwise, and which, in my opinion, is detrimental to the best interests of the Government, but that we are hindering the settlement of the country, and increasing the value of lands by building up corporations. Sir, this Government is building up the most gigantic system of corporations ever seen in the world anywhere; history presents no parallel to these corporations which we are bringing into existence; whose interests would be identical in these enterprises with those of railroad corporations.

Why, sir, railroads constructed by private enterprise, already extend over the United States to the extent of seventeen thousand miles. We have, in addition to that, under contract and in process of construction, twelve thousand miles more. The amount of capital already invested—and private capital, too—is between five and six hundred millions of dollars.

Here allow me to say that I am not inimical to railroads. They are in accordance with the wants of the age. I like to see them progressing and extending all over our common country. I like to see them everywhere; but I desire that they shall be constructed by private enterprise and capital, without any interference on the part of our Government.

Now, sir, while we cherish these institutions as useful, and as indispensable to the wants of the age, it becomes necessary that this Government should, as far as possible, see that all proper restrictions and restraints be thrown around them. Concentrated wealth is always dangerous to the liberties of the people. Concentrated wealth of this kind, in the hands of railroad companies, which extend themselves from one extreme of the country to the other, and which employ and have under their control hundreds of thousands of men—I say, wealth concentrated in such corporations as these, exercise a greater influence upon the Government than the old United States Bank ever did or could exercise.

I think it is well for us to pause, before we thus contribute the funds of the General Government to create a power which will seek hereafter to control the legislation of the country. We should endeavor to throw around them some restraint, and thus give security to the liberties of the people. We have already seen those institutions coming in here and demanding to control the legislation of Congress. We had during the last session, and we have had during this session, propositions before this House to exempt railroad companies from the common taxation which is imposed upon other classes of society, and that their associations should be permitted to import the products of our common country duty free. They demand that there shall be a discrimination made in their favor against the farmer, the mechanic, and the artisan who use the article of iron.

Is there no ground to fear that these institutions will hereafter control the legislation of Congress? A gentleman told me, when I opposed the abolition of duties upon railroad iron, that I spoke as the representative of the iron interest. I deny being the representative of the iron interest, the railroad interest, or any other interest. We ask nothing for the iron interest which other interests do not receive. We ask for no higher rate of duties upon it than are imposed upon other products. We ask that, when duties are assessed, the assessment shall be made equal; that no discrimination shall be made between different classes of citizens, or between the citizens of different States. I believe we have the constitutional right to demand, in opposition to the claim of these institutions, that railroad iron shall pay the same rate of duty which the farmer and the mechanic pays upon the imported iron which they use.

I put it to this House, if these institutions are not already attempting to control the legislation of this Congress. I would not wish to be understood as throwing out any insinuations against any individual upon this floor. I believe all members are as honorable men as myself, and I make no insinuations. But we are all of us, more or less, controlled by surrounding circumstances. We are, more or less, influenced by the wants and wishes of our constituents, and it is the question whether we ought to yield to their importunities in relation to their local demands.

I object to the principle of building up these interests in this way by the Congress of the United States. It is not only unjust, unequal, and unconstitutional, but it is, in an extreme degree, a most unwise system of legislation. Where is security afforded the American people from the grasping hand of avarice, controlled by concentrated capital? Where is safety given that the possession of the vacant, unoccupied lands of the United States shall afford an asylum to which the down-trodden and oppressed, who have felt the hand of oppression and of concentrated capital with crushing force, can flee, where they can settle, and not only maintain their own independence, but assist in maintaining the independence of our common country? I am unwilling that the wealth of the country should be concentrated in the hands of a few individuals, and then, after doing that, that we should place in the hands of these gigantic corporations the public lands of the country. I object to it as unwise, unjust, and highly detrimental to the prosperity of the common country. I ask my Western friends, who are asking for this grant, if they desire to have gigantic land monopolies in their midst; if they are willing to give the control of their public lands to capitalists in other States? Let them answer that question.

I have another objection to this species of legislation, and it is, that we put the influence of the Government of the United States in competition with private enterprise; and this bill, as I have been informed, is a bill of that class. If I am correctly informed, this very road to which we propose to make this donation of land, is to come in competition with another road now being constructed by the private enterprise of citizens of the United States. This system of interfering with the private enterprise of citizens is a very mischievous and dangerous one. A few years ago we attempted to give, and did give, the influence of the General Government to assist mail steamer transportation companies to compete with private enterprise in crossing the Atlantic. At the last session of Congress we voted from the Treasury of the United States the enormous sum of four millions of dollars, as extra compensation, to one single company, for carrying the United States mail, when we had propositions pending before this House to carry it for one eighth of that sum.

I would ask this House if they will allow Government to paralyze the arm of private enterprise; if they will allow the General Government to enter upon the field of speculation, and control the commercial enterprise of our citizens, by locating railroads in certain localities, and donating public lands for their construction? I ask this House if they are willing to engage in a system of legislation of this kind, which will have the effect of destroying the enterprise of private citizens? I take it that it is sound policy to leave the avenues of trade, commerce, and manufactures, open to the enterprise of every individual who chooses to enter into these fields of labor and industry. I take it, that it is monstrous policy for this Government to attempt to interfere with, and control, the private enterprise of our citizens. I do not believe it was ever contemplated that this Government should ever possess such powers. If the Constitution of the United States gave such powers to this Government, I hold that it would be unwise and injudicious to attempt to exercise them by a control of the private enterprise of our citizens.

I have already spoken longer than I intended when I rose. I intended very briefly to give my views upon this question, and to state a few points in opposition to enterprises of the kind sought to be accomplished by this bill. I have done so, without entering minutely into the discussion of principles, or elucidation of the points involved, because I was unwilling to occupy the attention of the House for that purpose. But this is a question which, in my opinion, ought to be discussed for weeks. We should examine this bill very carefully. We should refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that members might have an opportunity of examining and discussing it.

But, sir, as I remarked, I do not intend to enter minutely into this discussion, nor have I done it. I have barely hinted at points which have been suggested by the remarks of those who have preceded me, and which I have no doubt, if this discussion is allowed to proceed, will be fully elucidated by others before the subject is disposed of.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to make a single remark. I wish to say to gentlemen of the House, that if they suppose the Committee on Public Lands have any disposition to prevent discussion on this bill they misjudge us. I am perfectly willing they shall discuss it as much as they please, reserving to myself the right, when discussion is closed, to answer, as I am sure I shall be able to answer, all the objections that may be raised.

Mr. DEAN. I think we have had enough of this for to-day, and I hope we shall now go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and progress with the homestead bill.

Mr. DISNEY. I would inquire whether, under the pending motion to commit, this bill will not come up as the first business in order during the morning hour to-morrow?

Mr. LETCHER. I hope we shall have some definite time fixed for the further consideration of this subject.

Mr. DISNEY. It will come as the first thing in order to-morrow morning, I presume.

Mr. DEAN. I desire to ask the Chair a question, the answer to which I suppose will furnish gentlemen with all the information they desire, and then I will move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I ask the Chair whether, to-morrow being private bill day, this matter will not go over till Monday?

Mr. LETCHER. But will it come up on Monday? That is what I want to understand.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state, in reply to the gentleman from New York, that to-morrow being private bill day, and next Monday being resolution day, the bill, probably, will not come up again till Tuesday.

Mr. BISSELL. Will it come up as the first business in order then?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Whenever the committees are again called for reports, the call will commence where we now leave off, and this bill will come up as unfinished business.

Mr. DEAN. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Upon that motion I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARLAN, of Indiana, and GREY were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 35; no quorum voting.

Mr. OLDS. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. TWEED. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WHEELER. I call for tellers on that motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PERKINS, of New York, and GREY were appointed.

The question was then put; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 51.

Mr. DEAN. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and the motion was disagreed to—yeas 53, nays 82.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. OLDS. I withdraw my motion that there be a call of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Would it be in order now to move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to adjourn; and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, as that seems to be the general rule? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It would. The question is now on the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Messrs. HARLAN, of Indiana, and GREY resumed their places as tellers; and the question being again put on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole, they reported—ayes 67, noes 25; no quorum voting.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is it in order to move an adjournment?

The SPEAKER. Nothing has been done since the question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and, therefore, a motion to adjourn is not now in order.

Mr. DEAN. I ask for a new count.

The SPEAKER. If a new count be desired by the House it can be had. No quorum has voted, so the question is not decided; the motion is still pending.

Mr. ORR. I move for a call of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DEAN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House then adjourned (at twenty minutes past two o'clock, p. m.) till to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 24, 1854.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT, by unanimous consent, laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the acts of April 20, 1808, and March 3, 1809, a statement of the contracts made under the authority of the War Department during the year 1853; which, on motion by Mr. ADAMS, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, a report of the Secretary of War, communicating lists of clerks and other persons employed in the War Department, other than officers of the Army, during the year 1853; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

ATMOSPHERIC TELEGRAPH.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. appointed Messrs. SHIELDS, EVERETT, MALLORY, WILLIAMS, and THOMPSON, of Kentucky, the select committee to inquire into the utility of the invention of Ithiel S. Richardson, by which he proposes to convey packages, mails, &c., by atmospheric propulsion.

BRAZILIAN CORRESPONDENCE.

A message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 13th instant, certain correspondence with the late United States Minister at Brazil; which was ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EVERETT. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate, this being private bill day, to present the resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of the Nebraska bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART in the chair.) It will require the unanimous consent of the Senate to-day to consider any business except private bills. If there be no objection, the Chair will understand that consent to be given.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider public business.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. EVERETT presented resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts remonstrating against the passage of any bill annulling the Missouri compromise; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. DIXON presented the memorial of George Stealey, praying compensation for his services and expenses while on a mission to the Indian tribes in the northern portion of the State of California, under the authority of the Indian Commissioner of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a memorial of inhabitants of Wellfleet, Massachusetts, praying the erection of a custom-house at Barnstable, Massachusetts; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a petition of inhabitants of Seniston Falls, Maine, remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of the Rev. Leonard Woods and eleven hundred citizens of Andover, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition signed by Harriet Beecher Stowe and eleven hundred women of Andover, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of legal voters of Lunenburg, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, two petitions of inhabitants of Michigan, remonstrating against the passage of the Nebraska bill in its present form; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I desire to present the remonstrance of W. B. Whitworth and one hundred and fourteen other citizens of Indiana, against the repeal of the Missouri compromise.

I will simply say, in presenting it, that the memorialists do not express my views upon the propriety of this measure; but as I hold the unlimited right of petition, and as the memorial has been sent to me, I ask leave to present it, and move that it lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of the representatives of the religious Society of Friends, constituting the "Ohio Yearly Meeting," at their session held at Mount Pleasant, Ohio, February 18, 1854, remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CASS presented two memorials of citizens of New York, praying that measures may be taken to secure religious freedom to American citizens abroad; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. WADE, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of the widow of C. L. Williamson, late a commander in the Navy, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. ADAMS, it was Ordered, That James Thompson have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, to amend an act entitled "An act to divide the State of Arkansas into two judicial districts," approved March 3, 1851, reported it back with sundry amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Susan Coady and others, Cherokees, praying indemnity for property destroyed by some of the United States soldiers, near Fort Gibson, in the year 1845, reported a bill for the relief of Susan Coady and others; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. PETTIT, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Matthew Rippey, praying that a patent may be granted to Conrad Wheat, junior, or his legal representatives, for six hundred and forty acres of land, according to the plat of survey under the New Madrid location certificate of said Wheat, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Conrad Wheat, junior, or his legal representatives; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of G. A. Dabney and others, mechanics enlisted in the service of the United States, praying to be allowed for transportation from California to the Atlantic States of the Union, submitted an adverse report thereon.

IRA DAY.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, on the last private bill day I called for the consideration of the bill for the relief of Ira Day, of Vermont. It happened, however, to have been mislaid, so that the clerks were unable to put their hands upon it at the time, and so it was passed over. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of that bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill authorizes the Postmaster General to pay to Ira Day, of Vermont, $1,008 90, out of the funds of the Post Office Department, in full for the balance due to him for transporting the mail from Royalton to Burlington, in the State of Vermont, from January, 1833, to July, 1837.

This subject has been repeatedly before Congress. A bill was reported in 1839, another in 1840, and others at more recent Congresses. The facts are these:

James Barker and others were contractors for transporting a daily mail for four years from Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, to Royalton, Montpelier, and Burlington, (the great depot of navigation on Lake Champlain,) being the great mail route from Boston to Montreal, for the sum of $12,250 per annum, commencing on the 1st day of January, 1833, and ending in January, 1837. In the month of October, 1834, the Postmaster General ordered the route to be discontinued one day in a week, on that part of the route from Royalton to Burlington; which part of the route, for the transportation of the mail, was assigned by the contractors to the petitioner. Under the order of the Postmaster General, the mail from Boston arrived at Royalton on Saturday evening, and remained over until the Monday morning following.

The inconvenience to the public by this order appears to have been so great that the postmasters on the route and other citizens solicited and urged the petitioner to continue the transportation of the mail every day, notwithstanding the order of the Postmaster General. He did so; and by so doing the line was continued unbroken, and the mail was transported regularly from Boston to the capital of Vermont, and thence to Burlington, and vice versa, every day in the week. The petitioner, therefore, claims the sum of $1,008 90, being the sum withheld from him by the Postmaster General, on account of the order for discontinuing the transportation of the mail.

The order of the Postmaster General, if it had been carried out, would have occasioned great inconvenience to the public, for it would have delayed the mail thirty-six hours on one of the most important and productive routes in that section of the country. The order, though peremptory on its face, was, no doubt, designed as a temporary measure for the relief of the Department in its then embarrassed condition. This is apparent from the fact, that after the expiration of the petitioner's contract, the Department ordered a daily mail upon the route.

It also appears that the mail was carried by the petitioner, at the request of the Postmaster General, after the contract had expired, from the first of January, 1837, to the first of July of the same year. The one seventh part of the amount of the original contract for performing that service was also retained by the Postmaster General, and is included in the bill.

As the service was performed, and as the authority of the Postmaster General to issue the order to discontinue the mail is inconsistent with the contract, the passage of the bill was recommended by the committee.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the bill allow interest?

Mr. FOOT. It does not. I have only to repeat what I said when I called for the consideration of the bill before. This subject was very fully considered, and debated at great length during the last Congress; and a bill for the relief of Mr. Day passed the Senate by a decisive majority. The only question in controversy at that time, was upon the allowance of interest. The bill then included interest upon the original amount deemed to be due to Mr. Day. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, however, at this session, have reported a bill only allowing the principal sum, and not including interest. Presuming, therefore, that there will be no objection to the bill, I ask that it may be passed at once.

No amendment being proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

GRAY, M'MURDO AND COMPANY.

On the motion of Mr. SLIDELL, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill from the House for the relief of Gray, McMurdo & Co., which had been reported from the Committee of Claims without amendment.

The bill appropriates the sum of $570 70, to be paid to Gray, McMurdo & Co., of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, in full of their account for interest on moneys advanced by them in 1850 to the Quartermaster's Department.

During the period between May and July, 1850, Gray, McMurdo & Co. advanced to Thomas F. Hunt, Deputy Quartermaster General at New Orleans, $57,000, for which he received the drafts of the deputy upon the Quartermaster at Washington city. At the time those drafts became due, the appropriations for the Quartermaster's Department were exhausted, and the drafts were not paid until the 7th of October, 1850, the appropriation bill having passed on the 28th of September. Interest is claimed on the advances from the time they were made.

Mr. WALKER. I have no objection to the bill. I think it but just that it should pass. I asked for the reading of the report, to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it proposes to make an appropriation for interest only; and from the further fact, that there are other bills pending which propose to allow interest, two of which have been reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, of which I am chairman. I hope that when this bill is passed it will not be considered that the committee of which I speak is doing injustice, when it asks that the Senate shall deal out the same justice to others that it proposes to deal out in this case. I think that interest ought to be allowed in this case. I think that the bill ought to pass; it is but justice to the claimants here that they should have the interest upon this sum; but I do not wish that it should be a special case, legislated for favorably, and that all other similar cases should be rejected, because they are cases involving interest.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no opposition to make to this bill, for I consider it an excepted case, a case of advance of money to the Government without any obligation on the part of the individuals to make that advance, or without their having any interest in the making of it. I think the practice exceedingly censurable which allows a quartermaster, or any other officer, to draw drafts for money when there is no appropriation to pay, the amount for which they are drawn; but we are not passing upon that now.

Under such a practice, as I understand, the money was advanced by these gentlemen, who are bankers or merchants in New Orleans, without any other consideration than a desire to prevent a difficulty connected with the disbursements of the Quartermaster's Department. Under such circumstances, as there was no profit to be made, it not being the case of a contract into which the parties entered for their benefit, I should think it formed an excepted case, and that they would be entitled to interest from the time the money became due; although, as I have already said, I think the practice exceedingly censurable which authorizes any officer of the Army, or any other officer, to draw bills without the knowledge of the fact that there are funds to meet the draft.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

HO homestead BILL.

Mr. WALKER. Will it be in order for me to make a report from the Committee on Public Lands?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that unanimous consent has been given to the consideration of public business, so that, in the opinion of the Chair, it will be in order.

Mr. WALKER. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill to perpetuate preemption to actual settlers on the public lands, have directed me to report it back, with several amendments, and to recommend its passage.

That bill is designed by the committee to take the place of what is commonly called the homestead bill; and it does in point of fact, I think, more effectually than any other bill now before either branch of Congress, go to the extent of securing homesteads to actual settlers. As that subject will be one of great interest, and in all probability will give rise to some considerable discussion, I now move that the bill be printed, with the amendments proposed by the committee. I will remark further, before permitting the motion to be put, that if the bill shall pass, it will be necessary also, to change its title, and I shall propose to change the title to that of "An act securing a homestead to each head of a family."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill and the amendments will be printed without any motion being made to that effect.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McKean, its Chief Clerk, announcing that it had passed a bill for the establishment of a land office in the Lower Peninsula of Michigan.

GOVERNOR RAMSEY.

Mr. COOPER. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the report of the commissioners appointed to investigate the charges against Governor Ramsey, late Commissioner of Indian Affairs in Minnesota, have instructed me to make a report.

Before presenting the report, I wish to state to the Chair that it concludes with a resolution which I desire to have passed immediately. Governor Ramsey has been here waiting on the action of the committee; and, through my own neglect, and not that of the committee, the action of the committee has been delayed until this time. The committee unanimously have acquitted Governor Ramsey of all impropriety of conduct; and one of the gentlemen who preferred the charges has had the manliness to come out and say that, after hearing the testimony, he is entirely satisfied, and that Governor Ramsey should be acquitted of all blame. I ask that the resolution with which the report closes be passed now. The committee have unanimously recommended it.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; and that the accounts of Governor Ramsey, growing out of disbursements of the funds referred to in this report, be settled by the proper Department.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

On motion by Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, on the report of the commissioner appointed to investigate the charges against Governor Ramsey, be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Sidney Webster, Esq., his Private Secretary, announcing that he had approved and signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

"An act to indemnify the State of Indiana for the failure of title to a township of land granted to said State on her admission into the Union in 1816;"

"An act to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans;" and

"A joint resolution for supplying new members of the Senate and House of Representatives with such books of a public character as have been heretofore supplied."

LOUISIANA RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. BAYARD informally submitted an amendment in the form of a substitute to the bill granting to the State of Louisiana the right of way and a donation of public land for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Shreveport to the Mississippi river; which was ordered to be printed.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will ask the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Hunter] permission to say one word. The friends of this bill, under the impression that it seems to be the understanding of its opponents that the debate may be concluded at an early day, have consulted together as to how long a time its friends would be responsible for perfecting it, and have come to the conclusion that to-day, to-morrow, Monday, and Tuesday would enable us to bring the debate to a conclusion; so that on Wednesday, at one o'clock, I may sum up the debate, and then that we may take the vote on that day. I make this announcement with the view that those who are anxious to go away may rely upon how we shall proceed to act.

I would state, therefore, to the friends of the bill, that on that day I shall ask that the vote may be taken, in pursuance of what I believe to be the general understanding. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Butler] will, I understand, be able to go on to-day, after the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. CHASE. With the leave of the Senator from Virginia, I wish to say that, in conformity with a notice given by me on a former day, I shall propose a number of amendments to this bill, and ask the vote of the Senate upon them. But I shall not interpose any objection to the question being taken at the earliest possible moment upon the bill, consistently with doing my whole duty with regard to it.

Mr. HUNTER spoke an hour and a half in support of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER followed on the same side.

Having spoken an hour, he gave way at the suggestion of Mr. MASON, and the further consideration of the subject was postponed until to-morrow. [See Appendix for these speeches.]

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 24, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"A bill to divide the State of Illinois into two judicial districts."

Mr. STRATTON, by unanimous consent of the House, presented a joint resolution of the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, in favor of extending the same privilege, and grants of land, to the soldiers of the war of 1812 as have been granted to the soldiers in the more recent wars of the United States.

The resolution was read extenso, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present certain resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of Virginia, and move that they be referred to the committees indicated respectively on the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire that these resolutions be read?

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes; let them be read; they are very brief.

The Clerk reported the resolutions, as follows:

1. Resolution in favor of amending the act of Congress of 5th July, 1832, by which Congress assumed the payment of claims for half pay of the officers of the Revolution, and their heirs; so as to embrace within its provisions warrant officers of the Navy.

Referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and ordered to be printed.

2. Resolution in favor of so modifying the act of Congress of August 31, 1852, providing for the satisfaction, in scrip, of outstanding Virginia military land bounty warrants, as to authorize the issuing of scrip on all warrants allowed by the authorities of that State.

Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

3. Resolution in favor of the extension by Congress of the bounty land acts, so as to allow all persons who served, on land or water, in the war of 1812, and the widows and minor children of such as are deceased, an amount of land not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres each.

Mr. BISSELL. I suggest that the Committee on Military Affairs is a more appropriate committee for the reference of this resolution than that indicated, (the Committee on Invalid Pensions.)

Mr. FAULKNER. Very well; let it go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

It was so ordered.

4. Resolution in favor of an amendment, by Congress, of its law of July 5, 1832, so as to embrace within its provisions an adjudication and payment, by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, of the claims of the officers of the Virginia line, upon continental establishment, upon the same principles as those of the State line. Referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

THE SAN FRANCISCO DISASTER.

Mr. BISSELL. I move that a committee of conference be appointed to meet a similar committee appointed by the Senate, upon the disagreeing votes concerning the amendments to the bill for the relief of the United States troops who were sufferers by the recent disaster to the steamship San Francisco. As a committee of three has been appointed on the part of the Senate, I suppose it would be proper to appoint a committee of five from the House; and I suggest that that be done.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of William Carr Lane, contesting the right of José Manuel Gallegos to a seat in the House of Representatives, as a Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico, made a report thereon, setting forth the facts in the case, as they appeared in evidence before the committee, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. José Manuel Gallegos is entitled to the seat as Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico for the Thirty-Third Congress.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER presented the following Executive communications; which were severally read and disposed of, as indicated below:

1. A communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 13th instant, a statement showing the original cost of each custom-house, including expenditure for sites as well as construction; also the entire annual expenditure for the last three years, with the salaries of officers employed, and the amount of revenue collected during a like period; so arranged as to show at what points the expenditures exceeds the returns.

Laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

2. A communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with various acts of Congress, a list of persons employed in that Department other than officers of the Army, during the year 1853.

Laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

3. A communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 13th instant, a report of Topographical Engineers, in reference to a survey of Twelve Mile Creek, Lake Ontario.

Referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

4. A communication from the War Department, transmitting a statement showing what contracts have been made under the authority of that Department during the year 1853.

Laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

5. A communication from the Navy Department, transmitting three hundred copies of the Navy Register for the year 1854.

Laid upon the table.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS

The following bills from the Senate were taken up, in their order, from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by their titles, and severally referred, as indicated below:

"An act (No. 48) for the benefit of the heir-at-law of Lieutenant C. A. Wickliffe." Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

"An act (No. 92) for the benefit of citizens and occupants of the town of Council Bluffs, in Iowa." Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

"An act (No. 183) for the relief of Passed Midshipman George P. Welsh, and Clark H. Wells." Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

"An act (No. 167) for the relief of Joseph Campan." Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

"An act (No. 176) for the relief of John P. McEldery." Referred to the Committee of Claims.

"An act (No. 208) for the relief of John Devlin." Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Bill from the Senate (No. 153) "to relinquish the reversionary interest of the United States to a certain reservation therein mentioned, and to confirm the title of Charles G. Gunter thereto;" was also taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time by its title.

The SPEAKER. This bill will be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. COBB. I think it would be best to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. It was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims in the Senate, and the Chair therefore supposed that was the appropriate committee.

Mr. COBB. I am satisfied it is the wrong committee, and I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SAGE. I move that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee. I think that would be more appropriate.

The question was taken on Mr. COBB's motion, and it was disagreed to.

The question was then taken on Mr. SAGE's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BISSELL. It is suggested to me, by gentlemen around me, that in asking this morning for the appointment of a committee of conference of five members I asked a departure from the general rule of the House, and that three is the usual number of such committees.

The SPEAKER. That is true; three is the usual number.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask that, by common consent, the number may be changed from five to three.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

LANDS TO WISCONSIN.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the consideration of a bill reported yesterday from the Committee on Public Lands, "granting a portion of the public lands to the State of Wisconsin, to aid in the construction of railroads and branch roads therein;" that a motion was pending to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Have we got through with the bills on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. This is private bill day, and we have disposed of all the private bills on the Speaker's table.

Mr. ORR. I desire to make some remarks upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to suggest that it seemed to be understood yesterday, by common consent, that the further consideration of this bill should go over until Tuesday morning, in view of the fact which has been indicated by the Speaker this morning, in taking up only private bills from the table, that the action of the House is limited to-day to private bills.

Mr. ORR. I intended to submit that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. BISSELL. I yield the floor for the purpose indicated.

Mr. ORR. Then I move that the consideration of the bill be postponed until Tuesday next.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. Reports are now in order from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee heretofore appointed to inquire into the expediency of amending the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the mode of electing a President, be, and the same is hereby, instructed further to inquire into the expediency of limiting the term of service of the President of the United States to one term, and making him thereafter ineligible to the office of President.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, objected to the introduction of the resolution, and called for the regular order of business.

Mr. DISNEY. I am instructed, by the Committee on Public Lands, to report adversely on the petition and papers of Christopher Thompson and others, praying for relief in regard to the location of certain lands in Oregon. The facts appear to be these: The petitioners, in violation of the laws of the United States, settled themselves on lands belonging to the Indians within the Territory of Oregon. During a recent war they were driven off the land by these Indians, to whom, since peace has been made, the land has been returned. Now these men come and ask this Government to indemnify them for lands settled on in violation of the laws of the United States. In the opinion of the Committee on Public Lands they are not entitled to any compensation. I move to lay the report on the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. DISNEY. I am further instructed, by the same committee, to report adversely on the petition of J. A. Lapham, praying for compensation for services rendered in furnishing information to Messrs. Foster & Whitney and Mr. Owen, when they were making a geological survey of Wisconsin, Michigan, Iowa, and Minnesota. With respect to the case, the facts are simply these: The petitioner being in possession of valuable information in regard to the geological formation of the countries indicated, was applied to by the surveyors appointed by the Government of the United States to furnish it to them. He voluntarily gave it to them. Now, some three or four years subsequently, he asks the Government to pay for the information which he voluntarily communicated to these gentlemen, who were in the employ of the Government. The committee deemed that he was not entitled to compensation, and report adversely on the petition. I move that that report be laid on the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. DISNEY. I am instructed to report back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill of the following title:

"A bill confirmatory of certain school selections."

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill in extenso.

Mr. HAVEN. Is the proposition now before the House to put the bill on its passage?

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition.

Mr. HAVEN. Then I perceive that it is not in order to make my motion now.

The Clerk resumed, and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, the friends of this bill desire to have it put upon its passage. It arises out of this state of facts:

The provisions of the existing statutes authorize the authorities of the several States, in cases where a fractional township shall not contain within its limits section sixteen—the school section—to select a section in lieu thereof in such lands as do not fall within the limits of the township surveyed. Under that provision of law the authorities in these particular cases proceeded, in good faith, to make selections of what they supposed themselves to be entitled to. The land office confirmed these selections as school lands to the respective townships. Subsequently, the State, in some cases, disposed of these lands by sale. This they had a right to do, if the title were legally vested in them. Parties purchased in good faith, and paid valuable consideration for them, and the matter was supposed to be finally adjusted and settled.

Subsequently, however, the surveys of the Government were extended so as to embrace the islands in these boundaries. In the State of Iowa several islands in the Mississippi river were so embraced within the boundaries; and in the extension of these surveys it was found that, in some cases, section sixteen was comprised in some of these islands.

Here, then, is the condition of the case. The authorities supposing that section sixteen, belonging to the township for school lands, was not within their limits, proceeded, under the provisions of the existing statutes, to select lands outside of their boundaries in lieu of section sixteen. The whole transaction was carried on in good faith. The land office confirmed the selections, and the proper authorities of the State disposed of the lands in some instances, and they are now in the possession of innocent purchasers, who have acquired their title or right to them by the payment of valuable consideration.

It was subsequently, however, discovered that section sixteen was included in the island, and the question of legal title has been raised as to whether the township was entitled to section sixteen on the island, or whether it was entitled to enter on lands outside of its limits, and appropriate them under the provisions of the statute.

I believe there are some fifteen or twenty similar cases altogether in the Union.

This bill, then, is to provide a remedy for the case. If it should be held that the title to the sixteenth section, discovered by the final survey, was vested in the township, and that they were legally entitled to it, then they possess no title to the land which the State had disposed of, and which is now in the hands of innocent purchasers. If, on the other hand, it should be held that the original selection having been made in conformity to the statute, as the surveys then stood, the title thereto was vested, and that subsequent discovery, made by the extension of the survey, conveyed no title to the authorities, then sections sixteen, which are found upon these islands, remain in the United States.

But these questions can only be determined by judicial investigation and decision. Now, the whole amount involved in all these cases, in all the States, does not exceed two thousand acres. In order, therefore, to avoid the expenses and difficulties attending the litigation of these questions, and in order to avoid embarrassing innocent purchasers, the committee came to the conclusion to recommend the passage of a bill to confirm the selection, and to confirm the title to the lands in the State authorities. The whole amount, as I before stated, in all the States—in Wisconsin, Missouri, Iowa, and others—will not reach two thousand acres. These are the facts of the case, and they have induced the Committee on Public Lands to recommend this bill.

Mr. LETCHER. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio. If I understand the gentleman aright, he proposes to confirm to the State the title of these lands which have been taken in lieu of the sixteenth sections, and then to give them the sixteenth sections besides, when discovered?

Mr. DISNEY. That is so.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not exactly understand the reason, or the rule, which would give them the sixteenth sections, to which they were entitled in the first instance, and then give them, by this act, what is equivalent to the sixteenth sections. I do not understand that either equity or right demands this course. The fact that the amount of land involved is only two thousand acres or less, does not, it seems to me, at all affect the principle. We find in the bill the principle and the terms upon which these grants are made, and whenever the question of grants of lands shall again be presented upon this floor, by some member for his own State, precedents like this one are invariably brought up, and are claimed as controlling the action of the House upon his case.

Now, sir, it seems to me that a bill of this sort ought not to be passed without some consideration being given to it, or at least, without some opportunity being given for consideration. This House ought not to be driven into the consideration of any question here, when not a single member of the House has had the opportunity to examine the bill and to ascertain what will be its bearings upon present or future legislation.

But, besides, this is precisely the course of policy introduced here during the first session of the last Congress, by which this Committee on Public Lands effectually suspended the whole business of the other committees of this House, and thereby prevented everything and anything being done by this body from that time to the close of the session, which embraced a period of five or six months. The same thing is introduced here now. Member after member of this committee comes in here and presents bills for the consideration of this body, and immediately moves to put them upon their passage. The whole morning hour is thus wasted, and the matter goes on in this way from Monday morning to Saturday night, putting off all other business until the close of the session. I hope this thing will not be tolerated. I hope this Committee of Public Lands will be placed precisely where all other committees are placed, and when they present reports, the reports will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, so as to furnish the House with an opportunity to investigate them, and ascertain whether they are right or wrong. This is the rule followed in reference to the other committees of this body, and I ask that the same measure which is meted out to the one may be meted out to the others. I therefore move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DEAN. I am in favor, as a general rule, of referring bills to the Committee of the Whole. But I understood the chairman of the committee, [Mr. DISNEY,] who made the report, to state that this bill involved only some two thousand acres of land, and that it was to be given to the States exclusively for school purposes.

I should like to know whether these lands are intended exclusively for school purposes. It seems to me, that the House should have time to understand this matter, so as to be prepared to vote upon it. I was about to ask for the previous question, but if the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands desires to speak, I will not press it now; but I hope that he will move it. The Committee on Public Lands did clog up the business at the last Congress, and unless they manage soon to finish making their reports, I think that the House, in self-defense, will be obliged to refer all their measures immediately to the Committee of the Whole, and I hope that they will do it.

Mr. COBB. This advice, given to the House by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN,] is very sage indeed. I am inclined to think that the gentleman himself has been as forward to introduce measures, and press them upon the action of the House, as other gentlemen here; and now he gets up and tells the House what they ought to do, in violation of his own practice.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. DISNEY. I confess that I am somewhat surprised at the remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN,] with regard to the action of the Committee on Public Lands. The gentleman from Virginia talks about the House not tolerating this sort of proceeding. What does the gentleman mean? Not tolerate what? Not tolerate the Committee on Public Lands attending to the business with which this House has intrusted them? Is the fact of attending to business so utterly in violation of the general usage and practice of the House, as not to be tolerated, because it is a departure from the common practice of the House? Is that what the gentleman means? Is it so great a departure from the gentleman's own usage and practice, when a Committee of this House attends intelligently to its duties, and presses upon the House, in obedience to those duties, the consideration of a matter which has been intrusted to their hands, that he must rise here and talk to this House about not tolerating the attention to business manifested by the Committee on Public Lands? I ask, is it the contrast furnished by the attention and diligence of this committee that treads upon the toes of the gentleman? Tolerate! Is that the word? What does the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEAN] mean, because, forsooth, he too takes up the song and reëchoes the strain with the gentleman from Virginia.

The gentleman from New York talks about no business being done, because the Committee on Public Lands occupy the attention of the House. With what do they occupy the attention of the House? What does the gentleman from New York call business? Is it the discussion between the Hards and Softs? [Laughter.]

The Committee on Public Lands have endeavored to discharge the duties with which they are intrusted. They have endeavored to discharge those duties, I repeat, intelligently, and to possess themselves of the facts before they came to a decision, so as to be able at all times to give an intelligent reason for the action which they may recommend to the House. I trust, hereafter, when the committee, in accordance with their instructions, have examined and considered upon any matter, and have submitted a report upon it, as they are bound to do by parliamentary law, that we shall hear no more from the gentleman from Virginia, and the gentleman from New York, about clogging the business of the House, or calling upon the House not to tolerate it.

I endeavored, when I had the floor, to explain all the facts in connection with the bill. Those facts were plain and simple, yet the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] wants more time to consider. Why, how long does it take that gentleman to understand a plain, simple fact? For what length of time does he ask? Does he want to reëstablish the old common-law rule of fifteen days' notice before he can be compelled to plead? Is there any fact simple enough to come within his comprehension without having it postponed for days, weeks, and it may be months?

Is it for the advantage of the public interest? Is it the way to facilitate the public business, by referring every little trivial matter, and send it lumbering upon your records in committee, filling up your Calendar, until the House becomes dismayed at the immense amount of business standing there claiming its action?

Sir, it is my opinion that the best way of facilitating the business of the House is by the immediate disposition of these small matters, involving only one or two plain simple facts, as soon as they are reported in the House. Take, for instance, the bill now under consideration. As I before stated, all the cases in all the States in the Union that would come under its operation would not number more than some fifteen or twenty. It relates only to fractional townships. Every gentleman who knows anything about the system of surveying the public lands, knows that of necessity there must be the sixteenth section, which will fall within the entire townships, and therefore the bill does not and cannot apply to them. I repeat, that it is only in the case of fractional townships, where section sixteen does not, or did not, fall within the limits of the township.

In the original survey, in some cases it was found that in fractional townships, section sixteen would not fall within them. That survey proceeded only to the banks of the boundary rivers, and there stopped; and under the provisions which existed by statute, the authorities proceeded to select, as they had the right to do in cases where section sixteen did not fall within the fractional township, lands in lieu of fractional section sixteen. This selection was made in good faith, under authority of law, and was in good faith confirmed by the Land Office.

The authorities, in some of these cases, have proceeded to dispose of the lands so selected, for school purposes; and, as I have stated, innocent parties purchased them, paying a full and valuable consideration for them, and now are in possession. As I have said, the authorities sold these lands for full consideration. Subsequent to all this, however, after the sale had been made, and after these innocent parties had come into full possession of the lands, the Government determined to have their surveys extended so as to embrace the islands within the boundary streams. And here let me state, although I dislike to make so many repetitions, that these fifteen or twenty cases embrace every one, so far as school lands are concerned, that has been found in the Union, and so far as the surveys of the public lands have been made. It is not confined in its operation, to any one State, but applies to every State in the United States.

But to proceed with the narrative: after this subsequent survey had been made, a few cases were found in which the sixteenth section, in lieu of which lands had been before selected and located, fell upon islands in the boundary streams; and the question now arises, to which of these lands are the States entitled? Whether they are entitled to the lands selected under authority of law, in lieu of the missing section sixteen, as shown by the then existing surveys, and disposed of to purchasers; or whether the title is vested in the sixteenth section wherever found; and now found to be on the islands to which the survey has been extended, and thus disturb the title of the parties purchasing the lands originally selected? If it should, on the one hand, be held that the executive officers of the Government did wrong in stopping their surveys on the banks of the rivers, then the sixteenth sections, when discovered, will belong to the States; if, upon the other hand, it should be held that the surveys were right originally, when limited to the banks of the streams, then the lands selected in lieu of the sixteenth sections are vested in the States, and the parties in possession are the legal owners. The cases can only be settled by legal adjudication, and the whole amount involved in all the cases is but two thousand acres—or it may be less.

I repeat, that there are only some fifteen or twenty cases, and they are all fractional townships, and the whole proceeds are to be given to the States for common school purposes.

Mr. ORR. I perceive that the bill which the gentleman has reported is general in its character.

Mr. DISNEY. I so stated.

Mr. ORR. The gentleman states that there are not more than fifteen or twenty of these cases. I suppose he means that only that number have come to the knowledge of the committee.

Mr. DISNEY. That is all. But I made particular inquiries at the land offices, and those are all the cases they know of. The information I now give to the House, in regard to the number, is derived from the records of the Land Office itself. The bill involves only two thousand acres in the whole, applied to all the northwestern States, where these cases exist, and judicial questions will arise if a bill of this sort is not passed, involving more cost than the whole value of the land involved in it.

[A message was received from the Senate, by

Mr. MACHIN, its Assistant Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill "to authorize the construction of six steam frigates," in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.]

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman from Ohio wants to know whether it is the contrast of the faithful and efficient discharge of their duties, on the part of the Committee on Public Lands, with my own, and that of the committees on which I act, that has induced me to ask the House not to tolerate their course of proceeding. Now, allusions of that sort have very little effect upon me; for, so far as I am concerned, I take it for granted that my attention to the business of this House, and to the business before the committees, will, to say the least of it, compare very favorably with that of the gentleman himself. I believe that such would be the judgment of the House. But now let us look back to what occurred here last session, as well as this, and see whether the Committee on Public Lands are really entitled to all the compliments which their chairman has paid them in his remarks just closed. They have been engaged for the space of nearly three months in considering matters of this sort, and now, at the end of February, they come in and present these bills, and begin to urge them upon the consideration of the House, and to demand their passage the moment they are presented; and all this before there has been an opportunity to print them—before there has been an opportunity to examine them, or to ascertain the various provisions which they embody.

Now, why were not these bills brought in before? Why have not the reports been presented as the reports of other committees here, which have gone on the Calendar, thus affording an opportunity to members of this body to examine into all their principles and all their details? And, sir, the gentleman will recollect, if he will go back to the action of the committee at the last session, that this was precisely the course which was adopted at that time. Towards the latter part of the month of February they came in with their reports. They presented them here morning after morning. They asked their consideration, and an hour or more was wasted in the consideration of each. I believe that the action in regard to the reports made by the Committee on the Public Lands wound up at the close of the first session of the last Congress with the passage of the Arkansas railroad bill, and the passage of the Missouri railroad bill, although they had blocked up all the other business for the space of some five or six months of the Congress, cutting off every other committee from all opportunity even to present reports.

Now, sir, if this thing be continued, where is it to end? Here, on yesterday, we had the old arrangement of the first session of the last Congress started with the Wisconsin railroad. The whole morning hour was spent, and no result was reached in regard to it. That lies over until Tuesday next. This morning the gentleman comes in with other propositions, providing for the confirmation of grants in lieu of sixteenth sections, giving the new States two instead of one. Whether fractional parts or whole sections, does not affect the principle. Here is an hour or more gone this morning. Even suppose you decide this question to-day; to-morrow morning the gentleman comes in with another, and then goes another hour. By the time he is through with the stock on hand, my friend from Alabama, [Mr. COBB,] who is prolific, will come in with an armful—as is usual with him—and then we shall have it for at least a month. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman allow me to reply?

Mr. LETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will examine the Calendar he will find, that in proportion to the number reported, more bills from the Committee on the Public Lands were referred to the Committee of the Whole than from any other committee of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. I suppose that the gentleman's committee and the gentleman's claims stand exactly as the reports from the Committee of Claims, of which I am a member, stand here; and that he has no other right to any greater advantage in behalf of the reports from his committee than should be granted to every other committee on this floor.

Mr. COBB. I spoke of bills on the Calendar, and which have been referred.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well; they have so many referred. Now what is the course to get at the balance? Why they come here, and one member of that committee after another takes the floor, and no other member of a committee ever gets a chance to report. That is the game.

I had the curiosity yesterday to go up to the committee room of Public Lands after a conversation with my friend, the chairman, [Mr. DISNEY,] to see how many of these railroad applications were pending before the committee, and to my absolute amazement I found one hundred and seven on the docket! [Laughter.] Both these gentlemen come here, morning after morning, with reports and bills; and when, from present indications, is this thing to end? [Laughter.] It cannot be this session; and we shall have the whole time from now until the close wasted, every other committee cut off from the floor, and every private claim postponed until the next session of Congress, and perhaps even longer.

Mr. HENN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether I understand him to say that there are one hundred and seven railroad propositions before that committee?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir, one hundred and seven applications.

Mr. HENN. For different roads?

Mr. LETCHER. I do not know whether for different roads or not; but there are that number of applications for railroads.

Mr. HENN. I will explain to the gentleman. A great many of these applications are for the same road. I, myself, have presented twenty applications for one road, and they are all entered on the docket.

Mr. LETCHER. How many different bills have been referred in regard to the same road is not mentioned. My friend from Alabama [Mr. COBB] has acknowledged the corn as to five different bills introduced by him. [Laughter.] How many has the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. COBB. I acknowledge the corn to more than five. I have more than that number.

Mr. LETCHER. I mentioned it to you yesterday; but you did not seem disposed to acknowledge it then.

Mr. HENN. There are fourteen propositions from my State; but the committee have not examined them yet.

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Speaker, is not that modest for a young State! [Laughter.] No more than fourteen! Here is a list, furnished, as I understand, by the Clerk, in which there appear to be forty-four bills for independent railroads awaiting the action of the committee. There is no sort of connection between them at all, unless it may be that one line begins where the other ends. But here there are bills for forty-four independent roads to come before the House.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States, by the hands of SIDNEY WEBSTER, Esq., his Private Secretary, informing the Speaker that he had signed bills of the following titles:

An act (House bill No. 197) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," approved March 3, 1851.

An act (House bill No. 200) to confirm to Hercules L. Dousman his title to farm lot No. 32, adjoining the town of Prairie du Chien, in the State of Wisconsin.

An act (House bill No. 100) for the relief of William Blake.]

Mr. LETCHER, (resuming.) Mr. Speaker, I see that Alabama has eight of these bills under consideration, either reported to the House or now before the committee for action; Indiana and Illinois have each two bills; Arkansas has two; Florida has one—

Mr. ORR, (interrupting.) Mr. Speaker, is it in order to discuss railroads on this bill?

THE SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I am merely referring to them by way of illustrating my position.

THE SPEAKER. The question is on referring the bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the State of Illinois has applied for no road, and asked for none.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, I do not think that Illinois ought to ask for any, after getting two millions and a half only two or three years ago.

The SPEAKER. This discussion is not in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I merely refer to these matters for the purpose of showing that if the arrangements now proposed to be carried out by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands shall be carried out here, that it would render it impossible—utterly impossible—that any other committee can receive consideration during the balance of this session, and all other committees might as well be disbanded at once. I do not ask anything for the committee of which I am a member that I am not willing to have awarded to others. All I seek is, that they be all placed on the same footing. When our reports are presented here, let them be appropriately referred. Let them be printed, and let every member have an opportunity to examine them, and inform himself about the facts which they embody. And when this is done, then let members be called upon to vote.

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] tells us that this bill is a very simple one—that it contains but few provisions, and these very simple ones—and that the whole amount of land embraced by it, is probably not more than fifteen hundred or two thousand acres. It will be recollected that on yesterday the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands laid it down as a rule, that all the States were to be equalized in respect to the donations or grants of public lands for the purpose of internal improvement, or for any other purpose. Now you go on here and confirm the titles to the sections of land already taken by these States, and you award to the States, also, the sixteenth sections which they have not taken. How many of these cases will occur no one knows. We only know how many of them are before that committee. That is as far as we can go for the present; but when we open the door, we will find it a difficult matter to close it again. We must go on, according to the rule of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and equalize the States in their donations and grants.

Mr. DISNEY (interrupting) made an observation, which was, in a great measure, inaudible to the reporter; but to the effect that there were only a few cases to which this act would have to be applied.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well, sir; how many of them? Can the gentleman tell us where these lands lie? In what States?

Mr. DISNEY. If the gentleman had paid any attention to the facts, he would have known. I said they were situated in Alabama, Missouri, and Iowa.

Mr. LETCHER. How many acres are required for each of these States?

Mr. DISNEY. From three to four hundred acres.

Mr. LETCHER. And then, in all probability, Indiana will come in here, at the next session, and claim that she may be equalized with each of these other States, that have got three or four hundred acres, by virtue of this act.

Mr. DISNEY. This is a general bill.

Mr. LETCHER. So I understand. It is a general bill. You will confirm the title to the land taken, and give them, also, all the unoccupied sixteenth sections. It is general in that particular, at least. But is it not general further than that? Does it not open the door to those who want to get the benefit of the principle, and allow others to come in here and base claims upon this as a precedent?

But the gentleman says the case is simple, and easily understood; that he has made an explanation of the whole matter; and therefore the House ought to be prepared to act upon it. The gentleman knows the opinion I entertain in regard to him, and that I would impute no improper conduct to him. But I have seen bills presented to this House, under circumstances similar to those under which this has been introduced, which have been passed by this House, but which, from misunderstanding, or from a want of opportunity to examine them, operated to produce a far different result from that avowed by their friends and patrons upon the floor at the time of their passage. I want an opportunity to look into this thing, and so do the members of this House, I imagine. We do not come here to pin our faith to the sleeve of the chairman, or of any member of any committee of this body. We come here to examine these things, and to vote understandingly upon them; but if the rule now sought to be enforced is adopted, everybody will be cut off except an isolated individual upon a committee, who has examined the matter and given it his attention.

I hope this bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and there take its chance; and that other committees and others members of this House, as well as the Committee on Public Lands, will have an opportunity for the introduction of bills and reports between this and the close of the session.

I move the previous question.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Is the first question upon the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Reports are still in order from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House upon the Private Calendar.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. MIDDLESWORTH in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The first bill in order, for the consideration of the committee, is House bill No. 51; which will be read by the Clerk.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it objection day?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the fourth Friday of the month, and therefore objection day.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the committee now commence to take up the cases upon the Calendar at the point where objections ceased the last time the committee were in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. If no objection be made, that course will be pursued. The first bill in order is bill No. 246, for the relief of the children and heirs of Major General Baron De Kalb.

The bill was then read by the Clerk; and the report was in the process of being read—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As this report is a very long one, I move that its further reading be dispensed with.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to amend that motion by dispensing with all further action in reference to the bill until some day when we can have an opportunity to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee object to its consideration?

Mr. JONES. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it must go over.

The next bill in order on the Calendar was Senate bill (No. 17) "to reimburse to the common council of New York city expenditures made for the first regiment of New York volunteers."

The bill was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. BISSELL. This bill ought to pass. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. JONES. I call for reading of the report.

Mr. BISSELL. I will state to the honorable gentleman from Tennessee that the Committee on Military Affairs concluded to adopt the report of the Senate committee. I understand that that report has temporarily been mislaid by the Clerk. I will, therefore, make a statement to the House of the facts of the case. It is a very simple one, and the justice of the claim is very apparent. The committee thought so.

Mr. HAMILTON. If debate arises, the bill must go over.

Mr. BISSELL. I am not going to debate it, but simply to make a statement of the facts of the case in the absence of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The report has been found, and will be read.

The Clerk then read the report, which is very brief; and from which it appears that the bill merely proposes to provide for a balance of $3,672 90 of disbursements of money actually paid out by the Common Council of New York city, for the equipment of volunteers for the service of the United States, the payment of which was suspended because the vouchers therefor were not in the proper form.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think that the principle contained in that bill is wrong; and, as we cannot debate it to-day, I object to its consideration.

Mr. BISSELL. I do not like this plan of objecting without necessity or reason.

Mr. JONES. I say that I am opposed to the principle of the bill, and as it cannot be discussed to-day, I object to its consideration.

The bill was accordingly laid over.

The bill next in order on the Calendar was Senate bill (No. 33) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Major Caleb Swan, deceased."

The Clerk read the bill and the accompanying report.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is evident, I think, that there is not a quorum present; and that very few of those who are here are attending to the consideration of these claims. I therefore move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HAMILTON. We are attending to them very well, and I trust that the motion will not be agreed to.

The question was put; and, on a division, there were—ayes 7, noes 75; no quorum.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania, and CHURCHWELL were appointed. The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 14, noes 79; no quorum voting.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Call the roll.

The roll was then called, and the names of the absentees noted; and Mr. ORR taking the chair, the Chairman of the committee [Mr. MIDDLESWORTH] reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had found itself without a quorum, and directed him to report the fact to the House, with the names of the absentees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum having answered to their names, the Chairman will resume the chair.

The CHAIRMAN accordingly resumed the chair, and announced that when the committee found itself without a quorum, the pending question was upon a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question now is upon the passage of Senate bill (No. 33) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Major Caleb Swan, deceased."

Objection was then made, and the bill was laid over under the rule.

The next bill which came up in order for consideration was Senate bill (No. 134) "for the relief of Allen C. Johnson."

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to cause to be paid to Allen C. Johnson, of the State of Florida, the value of certain subsistence stores, turned over to him as captain in the Florida militia, at the time of his muster out of service, on the 6th of January, 1840, to J. B. Collins, a quartermaster in the service of the United States, but not credited to him by the said Collins in his returns to the Treasury Department; the amount so paid not to exceed the sum of $137 23.

The report was then read.

Mr. BISSELL. The Committee on Military Affairs have investigated this case very minutely, and think that the bill should be passed.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The next bill which came up in order for the consideration of the committee was Senate bill (No. 135) "for the relief of Adam D. Stewart, a paymaster of the United States Army."

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be paid to Adam D. Stewart, a paymaster of the United States Army, the sum of $150, the same being the amount paid by him as a fee to Ashley Ringo, for prosecuting a suit at law for the recovery of the sum of $2,000, stolen on board of the steamboat Tom Bolin, while the said specie was in his charge, and being transported, for account of the United States, to Little Rock, in Arkansas, in June, 1834.

The report was then read.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The bill next in order for consideration was Senate bill (No. 184) "for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth C. Smith, of Missouri."

The bill provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and directed to pay to Mrs. Elizabeth C. Smith, of Missouri, for her services as a private in Captain Holeshider's company D, of Colonel Gilpin's regiment of Missouri infantry volunteers, from September 16, 1847, to May 14, 1848, in which she served during that time in male attire, and under the assumed name of "Bill Newcom," as well as three months' extra pay provided for by the fifth section of the act approved July 19, 1848, in the same manner as if she had been properly mustered and regularly discharged.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill next in order for consideration was Senate bill (No. 264) "for the relief of Samuel K. Rayburn."

The bill provides that the sum of $105 should be paid Samuel K. Rayburn, in full compensation for the loss of a horse and equipage in the war with Mexico.

Mr. BISSELL. I believe that in this case there is no written report. The facts in the case are very plain, and well attested. Rayburn was a volunteer in the private mounted volunteers of Alabama, from which, in the neighborhood of Vera Cruz, he became necessarily separated a short time from the balance of the company, and in that condition was set upon by a ranchero, and while pursued by him, he had the misfortune to ride into a cistern, partially filled with water, and by that means his horse was killed, never being taken from the cistern. Rayburn himself remained in a very critical condition for some hours, until he was extricated from the cistern. As he lost not only his horse but all his equipage, he applied to the Department for payment for the loss thereof, but as the law provides indemnification for horses only when lost in battle, the officers at the head of the Department thought that they could not allow payment for this one, inasmuch as this one was not technically lost in battle. The committee were unanimously of the opinion that the amount named in the bill should be paid to Rayburn for the loss of his horse.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The next bill in order upon the Calendar was House bill (No. 265) "for the relief of W. D. Porter, of the United States Navy."

The bill and report having been read, Mr. WALSH objected, and the bill was laid over.

The next bill in order upon the Calendar was House bill (No. 266) "for the relief of Captain E. A. F. Lavallette, of the United States Navy."

The bill, which was read through by the Clerk, provides for payment of the sum of $346 67 to Elias A. F. Lavallette, a captain of the United States Navy, the said sum being the amount paid by the said Captain Lavallette to Lawrence Cardona, who acted as interpreter to the forces under Captain Lavallette, while he was discharging the duties of civil and military Governor of Mazatlan, in Mexico, from October, 1847 to June, 1848.

Mr. LANE. There is no need of reading the report; the bill explains itself.

Mr. CHANDLER. I can assure the House that the bill is a just and proper one.

There was no objection, and the bill was accordingly laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The next bill that came up in order was House bill (No. 267) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain William Davis, late commander of the United States transport schooner Eufala."

The bill, which was read through by the Clerk, provides that there be paid to the legal representatives of Captain William Davis, late commander of the United States schooner Eufala, $360 in full compensation of all claims against the United States, for and on account of the wages or services of said William Davis, as commander of said transport.

Mr. BISSELL. There is no written report in this case, but the facts are these: Mr. Davis was employed in transporting supplies to our Army during the war with Mexico. In the fall of 1848, while at New Orleans, he was ordered to proceed to Philadelphia by sea with his schooner. It was at a time when, for several successive days, the most violent gales swept over the Gulf. He started from New Orleans but never reached Philadelphia, nor did his schooner, nor any of those who were with him. The Quartermaster General has adjusted his accounts up to the time when he left New Orleans, but he says he had no power to pay for anything beyond that, though he recommends that Congress should do it. The committee thought it right to allow pay to his representatives up to the time when he would naturally, under the ordinary state of things, have reached Philadelphia, and that is what we have done.

There being no objection to the bill, it was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The bill next in order on the Calendar was Senate bill (No. 155) "granting five years' half pay to the widow of Captain John W. Gunnison."

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mrs. Gunnison, widow of Captain John W. Gunnison, deceased, upon the list of pensions, and pay to her, for the term of five years, from the 1st of January, 1854, half the pay to which her husband was entitled at the time of his death.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Oh, we are all conversant with the case.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is hardly necessary to read the report.

Mr. LANE. I move to amend the bill by striking out "five years," and inserting "ten years" in lieu thereof, so as to place Mrs. Gunnison on the same footing as the widows of other officers.

Mr. COBB. I must object to the amendment, although otherwise I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. LANE. Do I understand the gentleman to object to the amendment?

Mr. COBB. I do.

Mr. LANE. Why it merely proposes to place Mrs. Gunnison on the same footing as the widows of officers killed in the service. Her husband was clearly in service at the time of his death.

Mr. COBB. I do not object to the bill, but only to the amendment.

Mr. LANE. Then I withdraw the amendment.

There being no objection to the bill, it was then laid aside to be reported to the House.

The bill next in order on the Calendar was Senate bill (No. 117) "for the relief of Moses Olmstead."

The Clerk read the bill, which directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Moses Olmstead on the list of invalid pensioners, and pay him during his life a pension of eight dollars a month, commencing January, 1853.

Mr. WALSH objected to the bill, and it was laid over.

The next bill in order upon the Calendar was Senate bill (No. 100) "for the relief of Mary C. Hamilton."

The bill was read through. It provides that Mrs. Hamilton shall receive such pension, commencing from the day of the death of her husband, as she would have been entitled to had he died of wounds received in battle.

The report on the case was read.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

The next bill which came up for consideration was House bill (No. 268) to provide a pension for James K. Welch.

The bill, which was read, provides that the name of James K. Welch be placed upon the pension roll at eight dollars a month, from the first day of January, 1854, to continue during his natural life.

The report was then read, from which it appears that the petitioner enlisted in the service of the United States in February, 1846, as a private in company K, of the sixth regiment of infantry, of the regular Army; that while at Vera Cruz, about 8th June, in 1846, exposed to drilling and much fatigue in the heat of the sun, petitioner became sun-struck, and was put under charge of the surgeon. He becoming worse, was put in the hospital at Vera Cruz, and remained there about two months; that his right eye went out the second day, and the left in nine days; and that he has ever since been totally blind.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire if the individual in this case applied to the Pension Office. It seems to me that this is a case which comes clearly within the general law, and that the petitioner, upon application at the proper Department, could have received a pension.

Mr. DENT. The papers accompanying the petition show that he never did make application for a pension.

Mr. JONES. The general law provides for all cases where the disability was incurred in the service of the United States.

Mr. DENT. I do not suppose that the petitioner ever applied at the Pension Office. As the facts were reported to us, the committee came to the conclusion that the case was a very meritorious one.

Mr. JONES. I would like to know why the petitioner did not apply to the proper Department.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill next in order upon the Calendar for consideration was House bill (No. 269) "to create and provide a pension for David Towle."

The bill provides that the petitioner be placed upon the pension rolls at the rate of eight dollars per month, from the 5th of April, 1848.

The report accompanying the bill shows that the petitioner, on the 14th of April, 1813, enlisted for one year as corporal in the thirty-third regiment of the United States infantry, commanded by Colonel Isaac Lane; that the regiment to which he belonged marched to Boston, and from that place were afterwards ordered to march to Concord, in August, during excessively hot weather, and that from the exhaustion consequent upon the march at that time, he suffered so much as to disqualify him from performing labor of any kind.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill next in order upon the Calendar was House bill (No. 270) "to provide a pension for Captain Thomas Porter."

The bill provides that the name of the petitioner be placed upon the pension rolls of invalid pensioners, at the rate of twenty dollars per month, from March, 1831, taking from such amount the sum or sums as have heretofore been paid to him by way of pension.

The report was read by the Clerk.

It seems that Thomas Porter entered the service, in Captain James A. McClelland's troop of volunteer light dragoons, in the month of October, 1812; continued in said service for one year; was severely wounded at the battle of Missinoway on the 19th December, 1812. His horse was killed in said battle. Partially recovering from said wound, he joined his troop in the following spring, and marched to Fort Meigs; was in the first siege of said fort; at which place he was slightly wounded by a cannon ball, the same killing a second horse for him while in the attitude of mounting. He continued in the service till the close of the campaign, partaking in all the engagements of his squadron, and terminating with the battle of the Thames; after which he was discharged. Shortly after leaving the volunteer service he received, without solicitation on his part, the appointment of ensign in the 16th regiment United States infantry; and soon thereafter, without solicitation, the additional appointment from President Monroe of assistant deputy quartermaster general, with orders to repair to Carlisle, in the State of Pennsylvania. He accepted the appointment; and promptly repaired to the post assigned him, and there continued in the full discharge of his duties until peace was made. In the winter of 1814 and 1815 he felt serious inconvenience from the wounds he had previously received, and was confined to his bed for some weeks in consequence thereof. From the month of October, 1819, in consequence of said wounds, he has been confined to his bed, his crutches, and his staff. His sufferings have been great, beyond the power of language to express. The greater part of the thigh bone below where the ball passed has been extracted, and has left great inflammation, and a constant running sore. The Army surgeons certify to the disability, and believe that it was brought on by severe service and exposure in the winter of 1814 and 1815. The muster-roll has a note, showing that Captain Porter had his horse killed at Fort Meigs, his saddle, holsters, and pistols torn to pieces, and that he immediately supplied himself with another horse. And there is abundant testimony going to show that Captain Porter served his country gallantly and faithfully in every position in which he was placed; that in so doing he has received wounds which make him an invalid for life; that he is poor and needy; that the country owes him a debt of gratitude, and ought to pay it liberally and promptly.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask that that bill may again be read.

The bill was again read through by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The following amendment to the bill is pending:

Add thereto the words—

"And the amount found due under the provisions of this act shall be paid to the children of said Captain Thomas Porter."

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. As I stated to the House the other day, since the Committee on Invalid Pensions reported this bill for the benefit of Captain Thomas Porter, he has died. He has, however, left four children, and I offered this amendment to give the pension that was due him to those children.

It will be recollected that I stated the other day that the disability occurred in consequence of his wounds being aggravated by exposure while he was a captain; that he submitted proofs to this House of that fact; and that the member of Congress from his district had a special act passed giving him eight dollars per month. It appears that the passage of that special act prevented his name being placed upon the pension roll, as it should have been, at twenty dollars per month.

A MEMBER. Does he leave a widow?

Mr. LANE. He does not; but there are four children.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman what are the ages of the children?

Mr. LANE. Two of the children are young, unmarried women, who are now living with and are supported and sustained by a connection of the late Captain Porter by marriage. They are entirely destitute.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would inquire of the gentleman when the application was first made to Congress?

Mr. LANE. In 1831, I think.

Mr. HAMILTON. When was the pending application made?

Mr. LANE. This session. I will state, however, for the information of the gentleman, that some eight or twelve years ago an application was made to the Department for a pension, and the Department, believing that Congress had had the subject under consideration, declined to place Captain Porter's name on the pension roll.

Mr. LETCHER. I believe that if debate arises the bill must go over?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the rule.

Mr. LETCHER. Then let it go over.

Mr. DENT. I hope no one will debate it, but that the amendment will be adopted. I investigated the papers in this case, and know that it is a very plain and meritorious one. If the committee does not understand the case, I would like to state the circumstances, and why the amendment is necessary. It is a very peculiar case.

Mr. LETCHER. Let the amendment be read, that we may know what it is first.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. DENT. Now, sir, by your leave, I will make a statement. The papers in this case were placed in my hands for investigation. After the report was made out—indeed, on the very morning when it was to be submitted—news came that Captain Porter was dead. The amendment was offered for the purpose of giving the benefits of the pension which he was entitled to to his family. It appears that he has received only eight dollars a month since 1831, when in fact he was entitled to a captain's pension.

Mr. LETCHER. And do you propose to give him the difference between eight dollars a month and a captain's pension back to 1831?

Mr. DENT. We do.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, then, I object to the bill.

The bill was accordingly laid over.

The bill next in order on the Calendar was House bill (No. 272) "for the relief of Daniel Bedinger's heirs."

The Clerk read the report which accompanied the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON objected to the bill, and it was passed over.

The bill next in order on the Calendar was House bill (No. 273) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Colonel John H. Stone."

The bill was read through. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to the legal representatives of Colonel John H. Stone the half pay of colonel in the continental line of the Army of the United States, said pay to commence August 1, 1779, and to terminate October 5, 1804, the day of his death, the same being then due and unpaid in virtue of the resolution of Congress of August 17, 1776.

The report was then read, but—

Mr. MILLSON objecting, the bill was laid over under the rules.

The next bill which came up in order for consideration was House bill (No. 274) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Colonel Willis Rid-dick, deceased."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. As the gentleman who made the report in this case is not present, I think that the case had better lie over.

So objection being made, the bill was laid over under the rules.

The case next in order upon the Calendar was a report, (No. 106,) being "a resolution to refer the petition of Isaac S. Bowman, son and executor of Isaac Bowman, deceased, to the Secretary of the Interior for liquidation under the act of July 5, 1832."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. As this is a case of the same character with the last, and as the gentleman who reported it is not present, and it ought not to be passed without discussion, I object to its consideration now.

So objection being made, the case was laid over under the rules.

The bill next in order upon the Calendar was House bill (No. 275) "for the relief of James M. Lewis."

The bill provides that the name of the petitioner be placed upon the pension rolls of the United States, at the rate of eight dollars per month, from the first of January, 1850, to continue during his natural life.

The report in this case shows that the petitioner served his country about four years; that he was in military service, under the command of General Jackson, for two years, and took part in the battles on the southern frontier, where he received wounds, and that subsequently, in carrying an express from the army to Nashville, he was thrown from his horse, and so severely injured as to amount to total disability.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The next bill in order on the Calendar was House bill (No. 276) "for the relief of William Mayo, of the State of Maine."

The bill (which was read) authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to increase the pension now received by William Mayo, of the State of Maine, three dollars per month from January 1, 1854, making thereby the said William Mayo's pension eight dollars per month during his natural life.

The report (which was read) shows, that William Mayo, of Belfast, Maine, was in the United States service as an ordinary seaman, and that while in the service he became disabled, and was left at the port of Rio Janeiro, at the hospital; that owing to want of proper medical treatment, he lost his eye-sight ere he was returned to his home; that he has applied for, and received a pension from the Government, of five dollars per month, 25th February, 1846.

The proof of service and of his disability is complete, he being entirely blind, and without a connection to rely upon for aid or protection.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

The next bill in order on the Calendar was House bill (No. 277) "for the relief of James Walsh."

The bill (which was read) authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of James Walsh, of the District of Columbia, upon the roll of invalid pensioners, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 1st day of January, 1854, and to continue during his natural life.

The report (which was read) shows that James Walsh was in the service of the United States, as a private soldier, from the 6th of December, 1836, until May 4, 1849, with the exception of a few months; that at each expiration of his time he was honorably discharged, except that, on one occasion, he is reported as under ordinary disability, which continued only one month and nine days.

He also proves that at the battle of Molino del Rey, in Mexico, September 8, 1847, he was wounded in the left foot by a shot, which now renders him, as appears by the certificate of Surgeon Wotherspoon, of the United States Army, entirely incapacitated from earning his livelihood by manual labor, and that he is now an inmate of the military asylum, in the District of Columbia.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The bill next in order on the Calendar was House bill (No. 278) "for the relief of Jesse R. Faulkner, of Missouri."

The bill (which was read) directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Jesse R. Faulkner, of Missouri, on the pension roll of the United States, at the rate of eight dollars per month during his natural life, commencing January 1, 1854.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The bill next in order on the Calendar was House bill (No. 279) "for the relief of Albro Tripp."

The bill was read.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Albro Tripp upon the invalid pension roll, at the rate of ten dollars per month, in lieu of the four dollars per month which he is entitled to under the law passed May 4, 1852, to commence the 1st of December, 1851, and continue during his natural life, the sum he has received under said act of May 4, 1852, to be deducted therefrom.

The second section repeals an act passed May 4, 1852, "for the relief of Albro Tripp."

The report accompanying the bill was then read.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would ask the gentleman who reported this bill why the person for whose benefit this bill is designed is to have a pension of ten dollars a month instead of eight dollars, or whatever the usual sum is? I think there should be uniformity in the granting of these pensions.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not see the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHRISMAN] who reported this bill in his place, but there seems to have been a half disability established by the evidence; the petitioner seems to have been a captain. A disabled captain's full pension is twenty dollars a month, half of which would be ten dollars; and it is on that that the bill is based. The report shows that he was a captain, but that Congress did not understand that fact when the former bill for his relief was passed.

There being no objection to the bill, it was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Bills of the following titles next came up in order, and were objected to, as indicated below:

No. 281. A bill for the relief of Brigadier General John E. Wool. [By Mr. LANE, of Indiana.]

No. 282. A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Colonel Francis Vigo. [By Mr. HAMILTON.]

S. No. 54. An act for the relief of Priscilla C. Simonds. [By Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee.]

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills which have been ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that they do pass.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. MIDDLESWORTH] reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had the Private Calendar under consideration; and had directed him to report sundry bills without amendment, and with the recommendation that they do pass.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the House take up the bills just reported from the Committee of the Whole, and that they be considered together, they having been all reported without objection.

Mr. McNAIR. I object.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I desire a separate vote upon Senate bill (No. 155) "granting half pay to the widow of Captain John W. Gunnison."

Mr. McNAIR. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the bills which are objected to be noted at the request of any member desiring a separate vote thereon, and that the balance be voted upon, and passed together?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Let them be announced one by one.

The following Senate bills were then ordered to be read a third time; and, having been severally read the third time, were passed:

No. 134. An act for the relief of Allen C. Johnson.

No. 135. An act for the relief of Adam D. Steuart, Paymaster of the United States Army.

No. 184. An act for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth C. Smith, of Missouri.

No. 100. An act for the relief of Mary C. Hamilton.

The following House bills were then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and having been engrossed, they were subsequently read the third time, and passed:

No. 279. A bill for the relief of Albro Tripp.

No. 278. A bill for the relief of Jesse R. Faulkner, of Missouri.

No. 277. A bill for the relief of James Walsh.

No. 276. A bill for the relief of William Mayo, of the State of Maine.

No. 275. A bill for the relief of James M. Lewis.

No. 267. A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain William Davis, late commander of the United States transport schooner Eufala.

No. 268. A bill to provide a pension for James K. Welch.

No. 266. A bill for the relief of Captain E. A. F. Lavallette, of the United States Navy.

No. 264. A bill for the relief of Samuel K. Rayburn.

The SPEAKER. There is one bill still remaining undisposed of, being Senate bill granting five years' half pay to the widow of Captain John W. Gunnison.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I propose an amendment, to strike out the word "five," and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten," so as to place the petitioner upon the same footing with widows of other pensioners.

Mr. LETCHER. What will be the effect of the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The effect will be to give the petitioner ten years' pension instead of five.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was decided in the negative.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time; and, having been engrossed, and read the third time, it was subsequently passed.

DEATH OF GENERAL ARMSTRONG.

Mr. CHURCHWELL rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In obedience to that inexorable law of God, our great men have fallen around us like the autumn leaves. The badge of death is still upon us. It is a melancholy duty, Mr. Speaker, to announce the end of any one's life, but more particularly the death of a bosom friend.

With the going down of yesterday's sun the spirit of a noble American patriot took its flight. General Robert Armstrong is no more. After an illness of several days he expired near 7 o'clock, p. m., of yesterday, leaving a large family of affectionate children to mourn the loss of a fond and devoted father. He died of congestion of the brain.

He first saw the sunlight in the year 1791, making his age, when he died, sixty-three years. He was born at Abingdon, Washington county, Virginia. He afterwards removed with his father's family (Trooper Armstrong) to Tennessee, and settled in Knox, my native county, where he resided for many years, and enjoyed the confidence and esteem of a large circle of friends. He then moved from Knoxville to Nashville, and remained a citizen of the last-named city until called by President Polk to fill the high and responsible trust of Consul to Liverpool. While discharging the duties of this honorable position—which he did with honor to himself and credit to his country—he made many very warm friends in England.

The dread messenger has summoned from among a large circle of warm and devoted friends one of earth's noblest gentlemen.

He has gone to the grave. Need we deplore him?

He has gone to an honorable grave, having borne himself nobly and gallantly through his whole life.

He was the bosom companion and friend of that great patriot who sleeps at the Hermitage in my own native State. He possessed the confidence of General Jackson in a greater degree than any living man.

Of Irish descent, he was largely endowed with those noble qualities that always adorn the Irish heart—generous and brave.

He was a reliable man—true to his friends; true to his enemies; honorable to both. If I had the privilege and the honor of writing his epitaph, I would inscribe upon his tomb, "Here lies a true man."

He was a Democrat of the Jackson school. The last Congress elected him its public printer, and the present House of Representatives acknowledged their appreciation of his merits in that capacity by his reelection by a decided majority.

He had the confidence of Presidents Jackson, Van Buren, Polk, and Pierce. He never betrayed a trust, or proved false to a friend. As a soldier he rendered to his country distinguished services. Admirable man!

General Armstrong was emphatically the body guard of General Jackson.

In the last hours of the old hero's last days, when about to set his house in order for the great change common to us all, he addressed a letter to General Armstrong, expressing his warm feeling of devotion and regard. In the distribution of trophies of honor and fame which gallant States and a grateful people tendered him for noble acts and chivalrous deeds, he reserved his pistols and sword, which he had so often worn and unsheathed in defense of his country's honor, for his brave and tried friend.

He bequeathed them to the hands of General Armstrong. He says in his will: "As a memento of my high regard for General Robert Armstrong as a gentleman, patriot, and soldier, as well as for his meritorious military services under my command during the late British and Indian wars, and remembering the gallant bearing of him and his gallant little band at Enotchopco creek, when, falling desperately wounded, he called out, 'My brave fellows, some may fall, but save the cannon'—as a memento of all these things, I give and bequeath to him my case of pistols and sword, worn by me throughout my military career, well satisfied that in his hands they will never be disgraced—that they will never be used or drawn without occasion, or sheathed but with honor." General Armstrong received these emblems of glory and renown, by the request of General Jackson, through the hands of Hon. A. O. P. Nicholson.

They were preserved pure and unsullied—thus he leaves them.

"Death lies on him, like an untimely frost
On the sweetest flowers of all the field."

But, sir, I do not propose to go into the biography of this departed hero—history will record his fame. I only desire to pay an humble tribute of respect to a bosom friend.

Sad is the heart of many warm and devoted friends on this mournful occasion. The debt is a common one. We must all pay it—the law is inexorable.

Few are our days between the cradle and the grave. All things are subject to end and decay. Man, like all else, falls to the earth—to sprouts, trees, and flowers again:

"How short is human life! the very breath
Which frames our words accelerates our death."

In which that members of this House may have an opportunity to attend the funeral ceremonies of the deceased, I move that when this House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. EWING. I think there is a peculiar propriety in the motion which has been made by my friend from Tennessee. I know not what precedents may have been established upon similar occasions, if any have occurred; but General Armstrong was an officer intimately connected with this House, and from this fact, aside from his manifold virtues, the forms of mourning should be regarded upon the occasion of his death.

I thank my friend from Tennessee for having made this motion upon his own part, and cheerfully accede to his gratifying request that I should second it, and for connecting with it the still more gratifying suggestion, that I had the honor to be a favorite of the worthy man who has so recently been taken from our midst. I am proud of the compliment; and I should have heard it with unmixed pleasure, but for the fact that I feel that to stand so well with one whose standard of honor, truth, and probity was so exalted is a compliment that I do not deserve. I feel almost the shame of having practiced an innocent imposition upon his generous simplicity.

His whole career was one of manly virtue, and his many years were full of honor. He had served his country with such eminent distinction as to have won the proud title earned before by Marshal Ney—of the "bravest of the brave." And he died in a service not less honorable than that of the soldier, for in this day "the pen is mightier than the sword." But his higher, better, and rarer qualities; his generous simplicity of heart, his truth and honesty of character, were only appreciated by those who knew him as a friend.

But, sir, I will not undertake to pay to him a high-sounding eulogy. It would not, I am sure, have comported with his own wishes—with his own modest character. The tear of sorrow for his death, the kind word of condolence and sympathy with his friends, is the most appropriate tribute we can pay to his memory. I hope the House will adjourn over, and enable us to unite with them in paying the last debt of affection and regard to one who deserved it so well. For my own part, I shall feel it my duty, at all events, as an individual, whether this House adjourns or not, to follow in that funeral train with those who sincerely mourn the death of this worthy patriot and honest man.

Mr. McMULLIN. I regret that I was not apprised beforehand of the appropriate and praiseworthy motion of the gentleman from Tennessee. It would have afforded me pleasure, if I had been aware that this House would be called upon to commemorate the death of this great, and good, and distinguished man, to have said a few words in honor of his memory.

It has already been announced to the House, by the gentleman from Tennessee, that General Robert Armstrong was a native of Abingdon, in the county of Washington, Virginia, a county which I have the honor to represent upon this floor. It is needless for me to attempt to enumerate to this House, the many virtues, both of the head and of the heart, of the distinguished man now deceased. His history is recorded in the history of his country. But, sir, if the death of General Armstrong will be mourned in Tennessee, his adopted State, it will be deplored and mourned as deeply in the country of his nativity as in any part of this broad Union. It may well be said of General Armstrong, that he was a man of honesty and of truth; a patriot, and a hero. He has gone to "that bourn from whence no traveler returns," but he leaves behind him a character as pure and spotless as perhaps any man who has preceded him in the awful solemnities of death. I trust that it will meet the approbation of every member of the House, to pay this tribute of respect to his memory, and to his noble and exalted character.

The question was then taken on Mr. CHURCHWELL'S motion, and it was agreed to nem. con.

THE NEBRASKA BILL.

Mr. APPLETON. I have the honor to present the resolutions of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. I ask that they may be read, laid upon the table, and printed.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That we view with apprehension and alarm the proposition now pending before the Congress of the United States, to repeal a solemn injunction against the introduction of slavery into territory now free, and which was sacredly appropriated to the exclusive occupation of freemen by the compromise of 1820.

Resolved, That we hold it as nothing less than a violation of plighted faith to annul all that part of the Missouri compromise which remains to be fulfilled for the benefit of freedom and the free States; while all that part which was intended for the benefit of slavery and the slave States is rigidly insisted upon, and has been fully executed.

Resolved, That in behalf of the people of Massachusetts, we deplore the introduction of this measure as a proposition to disturb that which has already been settled: And that, if we are to witness fresh scenes of sectional animosity and contention, the authors and supporters of the Nebraska bill must forever bear the responsibility, and be answerable for all the fearful consequences of so flagrant an act of injustice.

Resolved, That His Excellency the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to each of the Senators and Representatives of Massachusetts in the Congress of the United States.

The resolutions were then ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Navy Department, transmitting a reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d of January last, in reference to the steam navy of the United States.

Mr. MACDONALD. The communication, Mr. Speaker, is in answer to resolutions which I had the honor to introduce into this body. I have examined the manuscript, and find that the reply to the fifth interrogatory of the resolutions is general in its character. The inquiry was in relation to the constructors and superintendents of our steam navy; but it was found to be difficult to give a full and detailed answer. In the report of the Secretary of the Navy, which has been sent us, there is a detailed account. It embraces the correspondence of the Department, and also the proceedings of the Navy Board. I felt it my duty to make this statement to the House, because on the question of printing, which I shall make, the object of the inquiry would not be answered by publishing the general answer, and I have no doubt that the publication of the detailed statement would furnish a useful document, certainly for the Department and for the country historically, in connection with our steam navy. With that suggestion, I move that the communication be laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Whereupon the House adjourned, at half past three o'clock, to Monday next, at twelve, m.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 25, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RAILROADS IN INDIANA, ILLINOIS, AND IOWA.

Mr. PETTIT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill granting a portion of the public lands to the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I have been requested to present the remonstrance of the representative committee of the religious Society of Friends, residing in the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland, against the proposed enactment of a territorial law for the Territory of Nebraska and the admission of slavery therein. I would state, Mr. President, that, as is well known, this class of the citizens of the State which I in part represent upon this floor, and indeed of all the States of the Union, are not that class of people who have ever, on any occasion, endeavored to do anything which was violative of the concord and harmony which should exist between the States, but have always been governed by the principle of their religious creed—forbearance.

Mr. BADGER. They are not political agitators.

Mr. COOPER. No, sir, they are not political agitators; but they do conscientiously and uprightly believe that the subject on which they remonstrate is one calculated to do mischief. I say this in justice to the gentlemen who have signed this remonstrance. I now move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a large number of petitions signed by citizens of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, praying an additional appropriation for the completion of the piers on the easternmost side of Reedy Island, in the Delaware river; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, three petitions signed by citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of the Nebraska bill in its present form; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, two memorials signed by citizens of Philadelphia, praying that the United States Mint, now in that city, may not be removed; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MALLORY presented the petition of Thomas P. Kennedy and J. Darling, praying reimbursement for losses occasioned by the burning of their store, on Peas Creek, Florida, by the Seminole Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WELLER presented the petition of L. F. Frazer, praying Congress to adopt a life boat, of which he claims to be the inventor, in the United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee of Naval Affairs.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of citizens of Hemen, State of Maine, praying that slavery may be prohibited in the Territories of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, four petitions of inhabitants of Maine, remonstrating against the abrogation of the Missouri compromise; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CASS presented four memorials of citizens of New York, praying Congress to enact such laws as will best secure religious freedom to American citizens resident in foreign countries; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of George E. McLellan be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Foxhall A. Parker be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the establishment of a land office in the Lower Peninsula of Michigan, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

On the motion of Mr. STUART, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to the Senate, at as early a day as one can reasonably be prepared, a bill making appropriations for the improvement of harbors and rivers.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, there is but a thin Senate this morning, and therefore I should much prefer that the consideration of this resolution should be postponed until we can have a fuller vote upon it. I suggest that it may lie on the table until Monday or Tuesday morning.

Mr. STUART. For myself, I should have no objection to the postponement suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce; but it has been before the Senate for several days, and I have been requested by several Senators, again and again, to call it up.

It is known to the Senate that I have been temporarily occupying the chair for the last few days, and hence I have been unable to do so. I however will now very cheerfully submit to the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, if it will meet the approbation of the Senate. I desire, however, early action on this subject; for I regard it as one of the most important that will be brought to our attention. I have been unable to see any reason for continuing the custom—for it is but a custom—of waiting for a bill to come from the House of Representatives on this subject. I have long noticed that such bills have come here at so late a day that they have been very imperfectly considered in the Senate; and they have not unfrequently been lost, because they have been crowded out by the necessary consideration of the appropriation bills. I confess, sir, that from the inquiries which I have made, I see no prospect of a bill reaching us from the House of Representatives this session at any earlier day than it has heretofore.

I may, perhaps, entertain views on this subject different from those of other gentlemen; but entertaining those opinions, I have felt it to be my duty to call for early action here, and I shall be as glad as the Senator from Maine to see a full Senate whenever it is considered; not that I regard this as a test question, for it is a mere question of propriety. I apprehend that any Senator might vote for this resolution, and not be committed to any particular course upon the bill that may in consequence be reported. It is a mere question at this time whether the Senate will exercise the functions that appropriately belong to it or not. As I said, I shall very cheerfully consult what seems to be the wish of the Senate in respect to the time of considering it, saying, however, to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that I shall personally be glad to oblige him.

Mr. CASS. I agree with my colleague on this subject. I wish that it may be considered, and acted upon fairly. Independent of what my colleague has very well stated, as to the time at which these appropriations are made, I will add that even at the long session they are almost uniformly delayed and carried into July, August, and September, before they are passed. The consequence is, that the business of that year is lost; or if not lost, it is done so hastily that it is done badly and expensively.

I can speak upon that subject with the utmost confidence. The appropriation should be made early, so that all the arrangements connected with the expenditures of that season may be made in time, in order to have the work go on as soon as the season will permit; otherwise your expenses are lost. Improvements have been commenced under former appropriations, which are intended to be permanent, such as those upon the lakes, the operations of dredging boats, &c., and they will be lost, utterly lost, and sacrificed as they have been once before, unless your appropriations go on.

Upon this subject I desire to say, speaking for my portion of the Union, that I consider these appropriations essentially necessary for its prosperity. I have a radical objection to transferring this power of improvement over rivers and harbors to the State authorities. In the first place, I believe it would take ages, upon any system of tonnage duties which you might adopt, to have it done. In the next place, I do not want what I consider the legitimate powers of this Government transferred anywhere else. I want them strictly executed, but I want them faithfully and constitutionally exercised.

There is no "noise and confusion" in that. That is all plain. I do not mean that I would pursue the system to extremes. It has been carried too much to extremes. I am opposed to roads and canals; but from the foundation of the Government, expenditures for harbors, and the mouths of rivers, have been made. Such improvements have been entered into from the days of Washington down to this day. I think myself the power is clear under the Constitution, as clear as any general power can be. I am, therefore, most exceedingly anxious that this subject should come before the Senate in such a way that it will act in regard to it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce will not insist on the postponement of this resolution. I moved, the other morning, to take up a bill reported from the Committee on Commerce, for the removal of obstructions at the mouth of the Mississippi river, and the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] objected to taking it up, because it was, as he thought, a proper subject for a general bill. Since that time I have received letters from several merchants of the city of New Orleans on this very subject. I will state to the Senate, that from the foundation of the Government to the admission of the State of Louisiana into the Union, repeated appropriations have been made for the purpose of improving the navigation at the mouth of the Mississippi river—a navigation which interests not only the State which I in part represent, and the whole valley of the Mississippi, but particularly the constituency of the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] and every State upon the Atlantic sea-board. Last year $75,000 were expended under a contract for opening the mouths of the Mississippi river. We have the report of the Secretary of War, which establishes the fact that this is the first appropriation ever made by the Government for that improvement which has had any beneficial effect. This sum of $75,000, pitiful as it is, has been expended with this beneficial result: that for the last twelve months there has been a depth of not less than eighteen feet of water upon the bar at the mouth of the river. But by the reports of engineers, and by the letters from these merchants, I am informed that that channel is filling up again; and that unless a further appropriation be made to continue the dredging system, which has thus far operated with such beneficial effect, we shall again be suffering the same evils which the commerce of the whole country was suffering at the time when that small appropriation was made. It is, therefore, a matter of great urgency to the commerce of the West that any bill which contains an appropriation for this particular improvement should be reported and acted upon at an early day. I concur in every word which was uttered by the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass.] All the appropriations that we make will be made in vain in relation to works already commenced, if we make them at so late a period in the session as to allow the works already begun to be destroyed or rendered useless. But if we make an early appropriation, not only will the sums already expended prove beneficial in the past, but will make a serviceable basis for future improvements.

Now it is not, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] has suggested, a test question which we propose. We are not discussing the system of internal improvements. Any Senator who votes for this resolution may, with perfect consistency, when the bill is reported by the Committee on Commerce, vote against any section of the bill, against an appropriation for any particular improvement, or against the whole bill. The object of the resolution is merely to prepare the way for efficient legislation on the subject. Under these circumstances, I cannot conceive that it is necessary that the Senate should be very full. I hope the resolution will be adopted this morning.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is very true that the resolution proposes no test, and a bill may be reported by the Committee on Commerce, against which members of that committee and other Senators may vote when reported. That is all very true. It is equally true, however, that this resolution does propose a radical and thorough change in the proceedings of the Senate. It proposes to report the appropriation bill to the Senate, and thus to do what has before never been done. Before the Senate shall take that course, I propose to say a very few words, giving my reasons why I think it injudicious. I could, perhaps, say the little I have to say this morning; but there are Senators who have intimated to me that they wish to speak upon this matter, and I refer to one in particular, the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] who desires to be heard upon it. I will, therefore, ask, as it proposes a radical change in the mode of proceeding in the Senate, that it shall be deferred until Tuesday morning next. My friend from Louisiana knows that we have no meeting of our committee until Wednesday morning; and, therefore, if the resolution shall pass before Wednesday, it will not be considered before that time. It will, therefore, do equally as well to pass it on Tuesday morning as to-day. I therefore hope, for those reasons, that it may go over until Tuesday morning, when it can be taken up if the Senate thinks proper to do so.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Why not name Monday morning? We may not be able to get it acted upon on Tuesday.

Mr. HAMLIN. On Monday morning it is quite likely that we shall have a very thin Senate. There are serious objections in the minds of some Senators to the proposition. They should be permitted to be present. I would, therefore, like to have Tuesday morning named, so that we may have a full Senate.

Mr. STUART. If I may thus far control the resolution, I will move to postpone its consideration until Tuesday morning.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

THE SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, a joint resolution for the purpose of manifesting the sense of Congress towards the officers and seamen of the vessels, and others, engaged in the rescue of the officers and soldiers of the Army, the passengers, and the officers and crew of the steamer San Francisco, from perishing with the wreck of that vessel, has been reported from a joint committee of both Houses. It is intended by the resolution to return some acknowledgment to those who aided in rescuing the sufferers on board of the San Francisco; and being a matter of that character, I take it for granted that there will be no opposition to the Senate taking it up now. It is one of those cases, being an act of generosity and of grace, that ought to be promptly acted upon, if acted upon at all. I will therefore move that it be taken up now for consideration.

Mr. MALLORY. I will ask the honorable Senator from Illinois if he did not understand the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. GWIN,] when he proposed to call up the resolution before, to intimate that whenever the resolution came up he had something to say in regard to it? I think it was so understood; and, therefore, I submit to the honorable Senator, as the Senator from California is not in his seat, to permit this resolution to go over for another day at least.

Mr. SHIELDS. The honorable Senator from California, who was a member of the committee, did not concur in the joint resolution, and did not approve of its terms, and asked time, when I reported the resolution and requested its consideration, to prepare a report expressing his views upon the subject. He informed me that he was endeavoring to obtain some information on which he could found his report. I had told him that I would call it up the first opportunity I had, and I believe he will have no objection to have it taken up. I have been waiting day after day for him to present his report, until I begin to find that the people think we are rather putting off the matter, and trying to hush it up.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. SLIDELL. I desire to say that I know the Senator from California [Mr. GWIN] is desirous to be present when this resolution is considered. He has some information to present which he thinks may influence the action of the Senate. Under these circumstances, I think it should go over.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have already stated that this resolution has been kept waiting for that honorable Senator from day to day, until I find that the people are beginning to think our object is to hush it up. I stated to the Senator from California, the other day, that it was my intention to call it up as soon as possible. He stated that he had intended to make an adverse report; but, upon calling on the Department, he had not got the facts which he expected, on which to base that report. He intimated that he would make some statements when the resolution should be called up.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will state what I believe to be the facts on which the Senator from California desires to obtain information. It is known that very large sums have been raised by voluntary contributions for the purpose of rewarding those persons, and the honorable Senator, I believe, desires to ascertain what amounts have been contributed, and how they have been disbursed. Now, for my part, I should desire very much to know those facts—how much has been received, and how much distributed already. The knowledge of those facts might influence our action upon the resolution, or upon the manner in which it should be framed. I prefer, therefore, that it should pass over until Monday; and I submit whether, under the circumstances, it would be at all respectful towards the Senator from California to consider it at this time when he is not in his seat?

Mr. WELLER. I would ask my friend from Illinois to let this question go over until Monday. This is only the first or second time, I believe, that we have sat, during this session, on Saturday. My colleague left the city the other day, not expecting, as a matter of course, that this subject would be called up to-day. He desires to be heard upon it. I would submit, therefore, to the Senator from Illinois to let it go over.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly, sir. I am very anxious that the resolution should be acted upon and passed, but I cannot refuse the request of Senators to let it go over. I will, therefore, move its postponement until Monday. Perhaps, however, before doing so it may as well be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, without amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I now move that the further consideration of the joint resolution be postponed until Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE AND ENGLAND.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I have observed to-day an article in one of the London papers which I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate—to the attention of the Committee on Foreign Relations—especially to the attention of the chairman of that committee, [Mr. MASON,] whom I am glad to see in his seat. I refer to a speech delivered by Lord Clarendon, the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, from which I will read a few lines. It is one of the most extraordinary declarations that has been made in my day. I do not suppose that it is very rare that such projects are concocted and matured among European cabinets; but I think it is very rare that they are thus publicly avowed. It is not often that the information of such a treaty finds its way into the public prints in such a manner. What Lord Clarendon said, is this; after speaking of the good understanding between England and France, connected with the Turkish question, he adds:

“Your lordships will be glad also to hear that the union of the two Governments is not confined to the Eastern question, but that the habit of a good understanding between them has become general on all matters of policy, and extends to all parts of the world; and that on the question of policy, there is no part of the world, in either hemisphere, with regard to which we are not entirely in accord.”

Now, there is no misunderstanding that statement. It is intended to be a notice to us that France and England have come to an agreement with respect to the schemes of aggrandizement of the United States, and mean to stop it. It means Cuba. It means any place where we wish to procure the acquisition of territory.

I observed that in the House of Representatives—I will not detain the Senate now with reading them—some most excellent resolutions have been introduced by a member from Tennessee, in every word of which I heartily concur; and I hope that our Committee on Foreign Relations will examine into the matter, and will introduce those resolutions into the Senate.

It is useless, Mr. President, for us to tamper any longer with these questions. It is useless to say that we shall not take our place among the nations of the world, and to declare, when interpolations are made into the system of the law of nations, regulating the Powers of the world, that we have no right to be heard. Yet we are told we are humbugged—I cannot call it by any other name. I do not mean to express disrespect to any one, but the country is humbugged with the impression that if we declare that a European Power has no right to interpolate provisions in the law of nations, it is an “entangling alliance,” and General Washington and Jefferson are quoted in opposition to it. How an entangling alliance is made by the declaration of the American Republic that the Powers of the earth have no right to interpolate a foreign and tyrannical system into the laws of nations, I cannot see. Mr. President, we shall have to come to this point. I have no doubt that the President and his Cabinet are well disposed. I have no doubt that they will take high ground, and support it with all the means in their power; but they want more than that; they want the moral support of the American Legislature; they want the moral support of the American people; and that support should be given by our declaration. The sooner we make it the better.

Mr. MASON. The paragraph from the speech of Lord Clarendon, to which the honorable Senator refers, had not escaped my attention. Whether it is meant to indicate, at any time, or for any purpose, any interference with the purposes of this Government, I do not know; but it is certainly unnecessary to place any probable construction on the paragraph, so far as Cuba is concerned, because this country has been distinctly informed, in a correspondence which took place twelve months ago between the two Ministers of France and England and our then Secretary of State, when the Secretary of State declined the proposition of the tripartite convention, the two Governments of France and England would consider themselves thereby committed to the position which they occupied in the correspondence which was commenced, and gave notice that whenever the occasion arrived, they would be found united; so that we have had fair notice. I should say, then, "forewarned, forearmed."

Mr. BELL. How have we profited by that notice?

Mr. MASON. We have profited, so far as I am informed, by remaining, as we ought to remain, silent and quiet. I do not know what sort of action the Senator from Michigan proposes on the part of the Government, or on the part of the Committee on Foreign Relations; but I should rather apprehend, in the present state of public affairs, this country profoundly at peace, holding her usual commercial intercourse with the nations abroad, that if a proposition of that kind had come from any Senator further South, it would have been looked upon as a sort of "abstraction." When the case occurs in a tangible form, I apprehend this Government will be prepared to meet it; and I, for one, am prepared to say that any interference of any description with the action of this Government upon this continent—considering South America, and the islands dependent, as a part of it—I feel satisfied, from what I know of the feelings of the American people, will be resisted by the whole powers of the country. But at present I am not aware of any.

Mr. CASS. The Senator asks me what I would do? I will tell him. I would pass just such resolutions as these, and support them to the last extremity. When so many people around us are struggling to obtain their liberty, and when liberty has not a friend in the world except this single country, and declarations are made that set at naught the public opinion of the world, we are told that we must not counteract them, because it will be an abstraction!

We might as well call the Declaration of Independence an abstraction. Such a measure as this is not an abstraction. To foresee a storm is to be prepared for it. Declare your principles to the world. Let them know what you will do when the time comes to do it. That is what we should do. We should take our position, and maintain it.

Mr. President, I will read the resolutions which have been introduced into the House; and I repeat, that I cordially concur in every word of them:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the people of this Union have ever viewed with the deepest concern the renewed intervention of Powers in the affairs of countries not embraced within their borders, particularly when such intervention had avowedly for its object the repression of generous political sentiments; and that they will never permit such an occurrence upon this continent without physical resistance to it."

"Resolved, That while the United States of America are disposed to observe, in a spirit of good faith, international obligations, they desire a similar observance of such obligations by all the nations of the earth, and that they can never behold with indifference the obliteration of independent States by a third power, because of the political freedom of such States."

"Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to cause a copy of these resolutions to be communicated to each of the diplomatic agents of foreign nations residing near this Government, and also copies thereof to be transmitted to diplomatic agents in foreign countries, in order that the sentiment and the purpose of this Republic may be neither misconceived nor misunderstood in any quarter of the globe."

The honorable Senator from Tennessee, put a very searching and touching question. What good that notice had done? France and England have said what they would do. Have we ever said that we were dissatisfied? What ground have we taken? I would let them know exactly what we would do; that is to say, I would let them know what our rights are. What we would do at a particular moment will and must depend on the circumstances of the case. But I would tell them what our rights are.

Mr. MASON. If a people do not know what their rights are, they will not learn them from us. I have as much sympathy for those who struggle for liberty abroad as any man; but if our example does not stimulate them to attain the same results which we have attained, our resolutions will have no other effect in the world; I apprehend, but to render us ridiculous.

Mr. BADGER. I wish the honorable Senator from Virginia would explain, if he pleases, a remark which he made a little while ago. He said, that if this proposition had come from the South it would have been pronounced an "abstraction." I wish to know from him if he is so ungenerous and unfair as to suppose that there is any exclusive right in the South to manufacture abstractions? [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. Why, Mr. President, the honorable Senator has not yet attained, I apprehend, sufficient age in the councils of the country to be aware of the fact that when the South has occasionally remonstrated against what I consider aggressions from the Federal Government—really existing, tangible and palpable to every sense—they have been, in some quarters, denounced as abstractions.

It was in reference to that that I make the remark. When the honorable Senator attains to more matured years he will understand the allusion. [Laughter.]

Mr. CASS. When you get to be an "Old Foggy," probably.

Mr. WELLER. I believe there is no question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT. There is not.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. WELLER. I have seen several wars gotten up on this floor with Great Britain; but I hope we shall settle this Nebraska question before we seriously involve this Government in a war with any foreign country. Settle our domestic affairs, those which belong to our own firesides, and then we may be ready to break a lance with Great Britain.

My distinguished friend from Michigan will never be able to forgive the British for their conduct in the war of 1812. I have as strong prejudices, perhaps, against that nation as that distinguished Senator, but I would meet them elsewhere than in the Senate. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Whenever any of these practical questions come up I am ready to meet them; but I have said, upon another occasion, that there is a great deal of time lost here in discussing abstract questions; and my friend from Michigan will allow me to say, that I know of no one who has entered to a greater extent into the discussion of abstractions than he. Whenever he will propose a practical measure the Senate will be ready to meet it. In the mean time, let us proceed to the decision of our own domestic affairs. I therefore call for the order of the day.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. McKean, their Chief Clerk, announcing that they had passed bills of the following titles:

- A bill for the further relief of Albra Tripp;
- A bill for the relief of Jesse R. Faulkner, of Missouri;
- A bill for the relief of James Walsh;
- A bill for the relief of William Mayo, of Belfast, State of Maine;
- A bill for the relief of James M. Lewis;
- A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain William Davis, late commander of the United States transport schooner Eufalia;
- A bill to provide a pension for James K. Welch;

A bill for the relief of Captain E. A. V. Lavalette, of the United States Navy; and

A bill for the relief of Samuel K. Rayburn.

Also, that they had passed the following bills from the Senate:

An act granting five years' half pay to the widow of Captain John W. Gunnison;

An act for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth C. Smith, of Missouri;

An act for the relief of Mary C. Hamilton;

An act for the relief of Allen G. Johnson; and

An act for the relief of Adam D. Steuart, paymaster of the United States Army.

Also, that they had agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill for the relief of the United States troops who were sufferers by the recent disaster to the steamship San Francisco, and had appointed Mr. W. H. Bissell, Mr. J. R. Chandler, and Mr. David Stuart, as managers on their part.

THE TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. BUTLER resumed and concluded the speech which he commenced yesterday.

Mr. BROWN next obtained the floor, and followed, in support of the bill.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, next addressed the Senate in favor of the bill.

[See Appendix for these speeches.]

Mr. CASS obtained the floor.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the Senate adjourns, I desire to correct an error of fact into which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Butler] fell as he closed his remarks. He quoted a passage from a work describing the condition of infant negro slaves in Massachusetts; and to my inquiry as to the period it referred to, his reply was, a period subsequent to the act of emancipation in that State. I thought, at the moment, that he was under a misapprehension. He has kindly placed in my hand the authority which he read; and, on examination, I find that he was mistaken, and that the statement referred to the period of slavery in Massachusetts. The statement is offensive in its character; but it is associated simply with the period of slavery, and not with any period subsequent to its abolition, which, in point of fact, was accomplished by the constitution adopted in 1780. I make this explanation, not by way of apology for the circumstance mentioned, but merely that it may be understood, and be placed to the account of slavery.

The further consideration of the subject was postponed until Monday.

The Senate then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 27, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. WALKER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Sylvester Pettibone.

Mr. FITZPATRICK gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill granting public lands in aid of the construction of a railroad from Beard's Bluff, on the Tennessee river, in Alabama, to Nasketa, Mississippi, via Tuscaloosa, Northport, and Gainesville, in Alabama.

REPORT FROM COMMITTEE.

Mr. FOOT. The Committee on Pensions have instructed me to ask that they may be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Mary A. M. Jones, Commodore Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, and Captain Hiram B. Sawyer. I will say that the committee are not prepared to grant the prayer of these petitions; but at the same time they do not wish to prejudice the claims of the petitioners by an adverse report, but are of opinion that, if provision be made for their relief, it should be by modifications of existing general laws. They therefore have instructed me to move that they be discharged from their further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. DOUGLAS, it was Ordered, That the petition of the executors of Henry Eckford, deceased, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Obed Hussey be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That the petition of Almanzon Huston be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Michael Hanson be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Mrs. Mary A. M. Jones be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

RAILROAD GRANT TO LOUISIANA.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Senate bill No. 8, granting to the State of Louisiana the right of way and a donation of public land for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Shreveport to the Mississippi river was under discussion a few days ago, and was postponed until last Monday. It went over in favor of the order of the day, the Nebraska bill. I now ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take it up with a view to its passage. The Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] I understand, is willing to withdraw his proposed amendment to this particular bill, which he had printed for the information of the Senate. If the bill be passed to-day, it can be reached in its regular order in the other House; otherwise it cannot be reached. I move that the bill be taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT. This bill has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment in the form of a substitute.

Mr. RUSK. As I see the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is not in his seat, it is proper I should say that I spoke to him in reference to this bill, stating to him the circumstances under which it appeared before us; that though there is a grant of land for the road, there has been a large amount of capital stock paid in. I mentioned to him the circumstances, and he said it was immaterial to him whether he offered the amendment to this bill or to any other bill. For the purpose of allowing this bill to go on and seek its chance in the House of Representatives, his amendment is not offered to it. It was only submitted informally, as intended to be offered and submitted for the action of the Senate.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and being read a third time, was passed.

RAILROAD GRANT TO WISCONSIN.

On the motion of Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill granting to the State of Wisconsin land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Madison to the Mississippi river, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with an amendment.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the reading of the bill will be dispensed with. The substitute reported from the committee is of the same form as those which have been acted upon.

By unanimous consent, the reading was dispensed with.

The amendment was agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

GRANTS TO LOUISIANA AND MISSISSIPPI.

On the motion of Mr. BROWN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill making a grant of land to the States of Louisiana and Mississippi to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said States, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

By unanimous consent, the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The bill was reported to the Senate, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read a third time, and passed.

GRANT OF LAND TO IOWA.

On the motion of Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment.

By unanimous consent, the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

GRANT OF LAND TO ALABAMA.

Mr. FOOT. While these railroad bills are being taken into consideration, I have one which I desire shall receive the action of the Senate. It is bill No. 205, "making a grant of land to the State of Alabama, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the line of Georgia, on the Chatahoochie river, to the city of Mobile." I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I wish to make a suggestion on this subject. I understood the Senator from Texas [Mr. RUSK] to say, that the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who has an amendment to propose to these bills, and some objections to offer to their passage, waived his amendment and objection only with reference to the Louisiana bill. If that is the fact, we are wrong in passing these bills without hearing the objections of the Senator from Delaware, and his proposed amendment. I do not wish to interpose any objections to these bills myself. I made my speech against them at the last Congress; but I think it is right, under the circumstances, that the Senator from Delaware should be heard.

Mr. GWIN. It is very well known to the Senate that the amendment of the Senator from Delaware will not meet the approval of a majority of this body. We have had a test question on that point at the last Congress and at the present Congress. I will state to the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania that some members of this body occupy a peculiar position with regard to these railroad bills. We shall be looked upon as having, in some measure, neglected the interests of our constituents, inasmuch as several bills of this character have been passed, and ours have not been acted upon at all. We have postponed the consideration of these bills for two weeks already to hear the Senator from Delaware. I am perfectly confident, that, with all the acknowledged ability of the honorable Senator from Delaware, he cannot change a single vote in reference to these measures; and I do hope that those of us who have sat by and aided our colleagues in getting their own bills passed for their States, will have an opportunity this morning to get ours through. There will be plenty left behind for testing the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on passing by the previous orders and proceeding to the consideration of the bill mentioned by the Senator from Vermont, making a grant of land to the State of Alabama, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the line of Georgia, on the Chatahoochie river, to the city of Mobile.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT. This bill is in the same form as the other railroad bills which have been passed at this session. The Senator from Alabama, however, desires to propose a slight amendment, to which there is no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I move to amend the bill by inserting the words "for the construction of said road within said State," so as to confine the grant of lands to that portion of the road within the State of Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

ALABAMA AND TENNESSEE RAILROAD

Mr. CLAY. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up at this time the bill granting to the State of Alabama public lands, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of the Alabama and Tennessee railroad, from Selma, on the Alabama river, to the Tennessee river, at or near Gunter's Landing; and also, the Memphis and Charleston railroad, from Memphis, on the Mississippi, to some point connecting with the Nashville, Chattanooga, and Charleston railroad. I will state to the Senate that this bill has twice passed this body, but has been lost in the other House. It has been reported back by the Committee on Public Lands in the same form in which it was introduced; and is, substantially, if not in word and letter, the very bill which has already been twice passed by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole. No amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read a third time, and passed.

RAILROADS IN CALIFORNIA.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill making a grant of land to the State of California to aid in the construction of railroads from San Francisco to San José; Benicia to Marysville; Sacramento City, via Auburn, to Nevada City, and Stockton to Sonora, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with an amendment, as a substitute, in the usual form.

Mr. GWIN. The amendment is the usual form of the bills which have been passed at this session, and there is no necessity for reading it.

The reading of the amendment was dispensed with.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in; the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read a third time, and passed.

RAILROADS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY,] has been called home by sickness in his family. Before he left, he requested me to call up a bill which had been introduced by him, and reported from the Committee on Public Lands, giving a right of way and granting alternate sections of certain public lands to the State of Florida, to further the construction of certain railroads therein specified. In accordance with his request, I now move that the Senate take up that bill. It has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with an amendment or substitute in the usual form. I wish to move some further amendments, by direction of the committee, and to ask for the passage of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out in the first section of the substitute the words "on the St. John's river," and also to strike out "Appalachicola" and insert "St. Andrew's bay," and insert also, after the words "Tampa bay" the words "and from Pensacola on a point between the boundary line of Florida and Alabama;" so that the grant shall be, "for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Pensacola, in the said State, to Jacksonville, or some point near thereto, with branches to the waters of the Gulf of Mexico, one of which shall terminate at St. Andrew's bay, and one at Tampa bay, and from Pensacola on a point between the boundary line of Florida and Alabama." &c.

The amendments were agreed to; the amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to; and the bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendments were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

RAILROADS IN ARKANSAS.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Arkansas, to aid in the construction of a railroad from a point on the Mississippi, in the region of Gaines's Landing, via Camden, to the Texas boundary, near Fulton, in Arkansas, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, as a substitute, in the usual form.

The amendment was agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in; the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read a third time, and passed.

INDIGENT INSANE.

Mr. DAWSON. I perceive that the gentlemen from the new States are in very fine temper after having got their railroad bills through. I never saw them with more smiling faces in all my life. In this state of things, I will now move, with the consent of my friend from Vermont, that we take up and pass the bill for the benefit of the indigent insane of the old States, and of the new States—the bill usually known as Miss Dix's bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will unite with the gentleman in going for the bill myself, though I know some gentlemen from the new States think it ought not to be passed.

Several SENATORS. Let us take it up.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the bill leads to debate, I must object to its interfering with the order of the day.

Mr. GWIN. I will state to the Senator from Georgia, that I have a slight amendment to propose to the bill; but I am willing to allow it to be brought up to-morrow morning, and put upon its passage. In five minutes the hour for the consideration of the special order will have arrived, and I do not think we can pass this bill in that time. I shall be ready to propose my amendment to-morrow morning, and the bill can then be passed at once.

Mr. DAWSON. All I wish is to have a little mixture of humanity with these appropriations for railroads. Let us have the mixture now. This is the time.

Several SENATORS. Now; now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making a grant of public lands to the several States and Territories of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons.

The bill is designed to grant to the several States and Territories ten millions of acres of land, to be apportioned under the direction of the President of the United States, in the compound ratio of the geographical area and representation of the States in the House of Representatives, with a provision, however, that no State shall be computed at more than fifty thousand square miles. The land, after being surveyed, is to be apportioned to the States and Territories in sections or sub-divisions of the sections; but to those States in which there are no public lands of the value of $1 25 an acre, land scrip is to be issued to the amount of their distributive shares in acres, which is to be sold by the States, and the proceeds thereof applied to the objects proposed by this bill. No State to which land scrip may be thus issued is to be allowed to locate it within the limits of any other State or of any organized Territory; but their assignees may locate it upon any of the unappropriated lands of the United States subject to private entry.

The expenses of management and superintendence of lands previous to their sale, and all expenses incurred in the management and disbursement of the moneys which they may produce, are to be paid by the States to which they may belong, out of the treasury of each State, so that the entire proceeds of the sale of the lands shall be applied to the purposes for which they are given. The money derived from the sales of the lands, and of land scrip, is to be invested in stocks of the United States, or of the States, or of some other safe stocks, yielding not less than five per centum upon the par value; and the moneys so invested are to constitute a perpetual fund, and the interest is to be inviolably appropriated to the comfortable maintenance and support of the curable and incurable indigent insane. If any portion of the fund invested, or of the interest, shall be diminished, it is to be replaced by the State or Territory to which it belongs. The bill provides how the insane are to be disposed in organized institutions, and prohibits the use of the fund, or the interest thereof, for the erection, preservation, or repair of any building for the reception or security of insane persons, or the purchase of any site or lands, for which the States must make provision. State legislation is, therefore, indispensable to accept the terms proposed, and to carry out the objects of this bill.

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom the bill was referred, reported it back with an entire substitute. The committee add to the proviso of the first section, which prescribes the area of a State at fifty thousand square miles, the provision that the representation of a State shall not be computed at less than six members. The second section they so change as to confine the donation of land and scrip to States, excluding Territories. By a new section the committee provide that the States shall not dispose of any portion of the scrip for less than one dollar per acre; and they are required to make annual returns to the Secretary of the Interior of the amount of scrip sold, and the value received for it. The committee strike out that portion of the original bill which prohibits the use of the fund, or the interest, for the purchase, erection, or preservation of buildings, or for sites or grounds.

The PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PETTIT,] on the 9th instant, when the bill was under consideration, to insert the following:

"Provided, That all the grants of land provided for by this act shall be confined to such States as have public lands in them equal to the amount hereby granted to such State."

Mr. WELLER. I am very sorry to be compelled to interpose any objection to this bill. I am in favor of the general principles incorporated into it; but I cannot vote for it just as it stands. It will be necessary, in my judgment, to amend it; otherwise, injustice will be done to some of the new States of the Union, and particularly to the one which I in part represent. I move, therefore, that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WELLER. I shall have to ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. DAWSON. Of course; we do not object to having our bills read.

Mr. HUNTER. The hour of one o'clock is at hand. I hope we shall go on with the special order. It will be a useless waste of time to read the bill now, for it is obvious that it cannot be acted upon this morning.

Mr. DAWSON. It will take but a few minutes.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I wish to say to the Senator from Vermont, who reported this bill, that I know the Senator from California suggests his amendment in no factious spirit, and with no view to defeat the bill, but simply in order to do an act of justice to his State. For one, I pledge myself to help the Senator from Vermont to get up his bill to-morrow morning.

Mr. DAWSON. If that is the object, of course I shall not object to the postponement.

Mr. FOOT. I am not responsible for the bill being called up this morning. I was desirous of calling it up for consideration at an appropriate time; but as we had reached so near the hour of one o'clock, I did not consider it proper to call it up this morning, and therefore I have no objection to letting it go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. DAWSON. I have no objection, under the circumstances, to the postponement.

The further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

RESCUERS OF THE SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. GWIN. I have prepared a minority report on the part of the minority of the Select Committee appointed on the part of the two Houses, to report a suitable form of testimonial for the rescuers of the passengers and crew of the steamship San Francisco. I ask that it may be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS. I promised the other day to call up, this morning, the joint resolution, reported by the majority of the committee; and as the honorable Senator from California was in his seat to-day, it was my intention to call it up; but as the hour for the consideration of the special order has arrived, I will defer the motion until to-morrow morning. Then, I suppose, the Senator from California will be ready to allow us to dispose of the matter finally.

Mr. GWIN. I shall be ready.

The motion to print the minority report was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. RUSK offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what amount has been paid for the transportation of troops, supplies, and munitions for the land and naval forces on the Pacific ocean; also, what has been paid for the transportation of the mails, including the transportation by sea and across the isthmus, for way agents, agents at Chagres and Panama, and what amount, if any, has been paid to the contractor on the line by way of Vera Cruz and Acapulco, for the last three years, designating the amounts for each year.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the following committees, as annexed:

A bill for the further relief of Albra Tripp—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill for the relief of Jesse R. Faulkner, of Missouri—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill for the relief of James Walsh—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill for the relief of William Mayo, of the State of Maine—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill for the relief of James M. Lewis—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain William Davis, late commander of the United States transport schooner Eufalia—to the Committee of Claims.

A bill to provide a pension for James K. Welch—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill for the relief of Captain E. A. V. Lavalette, of the United States Navy—to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A bill for the relief of Samuel K. Rayburn—to the Committee of Claims.

SIGNING OF ENROLLED BILLS.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. McKean, its Chief Clerk, announcing that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

An act for the relief of John O. Mears;

Joint resolution authorizing a supplemental contract for certain marble for the Capitol extension;

An act for the extension of the preemption privilege in the State of California;

An act granting five years' half pay to the widow of Captain John W. Gunnison;

An act for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth C. Smith, of Missouri;

An act for the relief of Mary C. Hamilton;

An act for the relief of Allen G. Johnson; and

An act for the relief of Adam D. Steuart, paymaster of the United States Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore then signed the above-named bills.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. CHASE. I desire to lay upon the table informally an amendment which I intend to propose to this bill. I ask that it be printed.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. CASS, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate at length on the question of the powers of the General Government over the subject of slavery in the Territories. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. COOPER next addressed the Senate on the same subject. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. President, as I made a speech nearly six years ago in favor of the principles of this bill, and discussed at some length the questions which have been brought to the notice of the Senate during this debate, I had determined to give a silent vote; but as I cannot concur in the positions taken by my honorable colleague, [Mr. COOPER,] or in the views advanced by him, it may seem obligatory, and I feel it to be so, on me to make a brief reply. I regret the circumstance. I regret to be obliged to differ from my honorable and respected colleague on this subject. I entertained the hope that there would be one Whig north of Mason & Dixon's line—and that that Whig would be my honorable colleague—who would unite on this question with his southern Whig brethren, and not join the sectional party which is now getting up in the country; but, sir, I have been somewhat disappointed; and, as I find myself obliged to differ from him, I must ask the favor of the Senate to give me a brief hearing in the morning in reply. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 27, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

PUBLIC PRINTER.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I rise to a privileged question. It is known to this body that the public printer of the House of Representatives has died. According to my view of the law authorizing the election of a public printer for the House of Representatives, I conceive that office to be now vacant. I therefore offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House will, on to-morrow, at two o'clock, p. m., proceed to the election of a public printer for the House of Representatives, to serve during the remainder of the present Congress, in place of Robert Armstrong, deceased.

Mr. DEAN. I move to amend by substituting Monday next for to-morrow.

Mr. FLORENCE. What is to become of our printing in the mean time? Let us proceed to the election of a public printer to-morrow; the sooner the better.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he make the election for a public printer come up at once. There is no use in appointing a time in the future for that purpose.

Mr. DEAN. I believe that I have the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Understanding that the gentlemen want a caucus over the matter I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. DEAN. The object in fixing Monday next as the time for the election is because on to-morrow the homestead bill will be up. It has been already under discussion, and on last Thursday there was an endeavor to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order to close the five-minutes debate. I am of the opinion that the homestead bill should be first considered and disposed of. There need be no haste about this matter of the public printing. Monday next is as soon as the House ought to be called on to vote for a public printer. This is a matter about which there can be no discussion, and—

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Before the gentleman calls for the previous question, I would like to suggest that the election of the public printer ought not to be postponed until next Monday, for the reason that in the mean time there will be no authority conferred on anybody to execute the printing of the House which will necessarily occur during the present week. The printing of bills and reports, which are constantly presented, and which are required by the laws to be returned to the House the next day after they have been ordered to be printed, cannot be executed, because there is no power with anybody to execute them.

Mr. DEAN. During the last Congress, for nearly a whole session we were without a public printer; and I can see no necessity for any particular haste in this matter now. I think the members of the House ought to have time to consider this matter; and that we ought to understand, also, who we are to elect, and whether any new tests are to be imposed upon us by these candidates before we elect one. I call the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman withdraw his call for a moment? I will renew it.

Mr. DEAN. For a moment.

Mr. JONES. I merely wish to say that I do not agree with my friend who has introduced the resolution. I do not consider that the position of the public printer is an office of this House, or of the Government, but that it is a contract to do certain work.

But, sir, if it is the determination of the House to consider it as an office, and that it is now vacant; or that it is in such a position, whether under a contract or office, as now requires the action of this House, I think that we should go into this election on to-morrow, at furthest. To test the sense of the House whether I am right in the estimation of the House or not, I will first, in compliance with the promise I made to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN,] move the previous question, and then I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. DEAN. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to withdraw the motion for a moment, that I may modify my motion so as to provide that the election shall take place on Wednesday next, instead of Monday.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I trust the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw it.

Mr. DEAN. I now modify my motion by in-serting "Wednesday" in the place of "Monday." I move the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe I had the floor, Mr. Speaker, after the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] withdrew his motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN,] and he modified his motion, as the Chair holds he has a right to do.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I appeal to the gentleman from New York to withdraw his call for the previous question for a moment.

Mr. DEAN. I will, if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. DAVIS. I will do so. I was remarking that I differed with my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] in reference to the view he takes of the character of this law. The act which authorizes the election of public printer, and which was passed during the first session of the last Congress, is in these words:

"Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be elected a public printer for each House of Congress, to do the public printing for the Congress for which he or they may be chosen; and such printing for the Executive Departments and bureaus of the Government of the United States as may be delivered to him or them to be printed by the Superintendent of the public printing. The following rates, &c., shall be 'allowed,' &c."

That, as I take it, creates an office, and the printer elected under it is an officer of this House. He is not required to give any bond for the performance of the duties of the office, it is true, but that does not change the principle involved. Sir, he is just as much an officer of the House as the Clerk is, or as the Speaker of the House of Representatives himself is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DAVIS,] when this law was passed creating a public printer, whether it was not intended to be something more than a mere contract; whether it did not involve the idea of trust and confidence, of personal fitness and qualifications? I contend that it was not to be assignable, and that the benefits of it would not descend to the heirs.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask whether that was not the argument used in favor of that law?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not remember what were the arguments used in reference to this matter; I desire nothing further than the act itself to convince me that the public printer is as much an officer of this House as your Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Postmaster, or the Speaker. We did not elect the printing establishment as the public printer. We elected an individual as such officer; and the law provides that the public printing shall be presented to and be done by that person, and not by the establishment, not by the "Union" office. When that individual ceases to live the office expires with him, and cannot descend, by any fair and liberal construction of the law, to his heirs, executors, or administrators. I will not detain the House with arguments in reference to this question, for it seems to me to be so clear and palpable a matter that "he who runs may read." In compliance with my promise to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN,] I renew the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] proposes to go into the election of a public printer to-morrow, at two o'clock. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEAN] moves to strike out the words "to-morrow," and insert the words "Wednesday next." The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] demands the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Indiana withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment? I should like to make a brief explanation in regard to this matter.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not like to withdraw it.

Mr. JONES. As the gentleman does not withdraw the demand for the previous question, I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. WALKER. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. JONES's motion; and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

Upon the demand for the previous question, a division being had, there were—yeas 76, noes not counted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers, which were ordered; and Messrs. HAMILTON and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—yeas 77, noes 45.

The previous question having received a second, the main question was then ordered to be put.

The question being first upon the amendment to strike out "to-morrow" and insert "Wednesday next" was put, and, upon a division, 52 rose in the affirmative.

Mr. WALSH. I demand tellers upon the adoption of the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CHURCHWELL and CAMPBELL were appointed.

Mr. CUTTING. Is it in order to take the question first upon striking out and then upon inserting?

The SPEAKER. It is not. Under parliamentary law the question would be divisible, but by an express rule of the House the motion to strike out and insert is indivisible.

The question was again put; and the tellers reported—yeas 72, noes 68.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Appleton, Ball, Bell, Bennett, Benson, Breckinridge, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Canthers, Christian, Cook, Corwin, Craigie, Crocker, Cullom, Cutting, Thomas Davis, Dean, Dick, Drum, Dunbar, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmonds, English, Etheridge, Ewing, Farley, Fenton, Flagler, Giddings, Goodrich, Green, Grey, Harrison, Haven, Hiester, Hughes, Hunt, Daniel T. Jones, Kerr, Kittredge, Knox, Lamb, Latham, Lindley, Lindsey, McCulloch, McMullin, Macy, Matteson, Maurice, Middlesworth, John G. Miller, Morrison, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Pennington, Phillips, Pratt, Preston, Furey, David Ritchie, Rowe, Ruffin, Russell, Sablin, Sage, Sapp, Seymour, Shaw, Showers, Simmons, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stratton, Straub, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Upham, Wade, Walsh, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Yates, and Zolllicoffer—96.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Bissell, Bockock, Boyce, Bridges, Caskie, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chastain, Churchwell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Cox, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dowdell, Edmundson, Ellison, Faulkner, Florence, Fuller, Gamble, Greenwood, Grow, Hamilton, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hill, Ingersoll, Johnson, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kirtz, Lane, Letcher, Lilly, Macdonald, McDougall, McNair, Maxwell, Mayall, Smith Miller, Milson, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Packer, Peck, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Ready, Reese, Richardson, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Seward, Skelton, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Hester L. Stevens, Tweed, Vail, Nansant, Whitbridge, Walker, Warren, Wells, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—86.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the resolution as amended, and it was adopted.

Mr. DEAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the special order.

STEAM FRIGATE BILL.

Mr. BOCOCK. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion, to enable me to make a motion, with a view to bring before this House, at an early day, the bill to authorize the construction of six steam frigates. Will the gentleman do it?

Mr. DAWSON. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. BOCOCK. I wish to make a motion in relation to this subject, and I am perfectly willing to consult the temper and wishes of the House as to the particular motion that I shall submit.

I suppose that almost every member of this House, if not every one, is perfectly satisfied, as every member of the Senate was satisfied, that there is a propriety in the passage of this bill, and its immediate passage. If I was certain that that was the temper of the whole House, the motion that I would make would be to suspend the rules, for the purpose of taking up the Senate bill, with a pledge on my part, that if no one else wished to discuss it I would not, but would move the previous question, and bring the House to a vote upon it.

[Cries of "Agreed!" and "Try it!"]

Mr. BOCOCK. As that seems to be the wish of the House, I move to suspend the rules to take up the Senate bill, with a pledge on my part, that when the bill is taken up, if I can obtain the floor, I will immediately move the previous question, so as to cut off debate and bring the House to a vote upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We want to discuss the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The bill would have to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOCOCK. I suppose the House understands that there is a rule making it necessary that every bill which involves an appropriation shall go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? Unless some such motion as this is made and carried, when the Senate bill is reported, it must, under that rule, go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WALSH. Well, let it go there.

Mr. BOCOCK. It will go to the foot of the Calendar, and will be reached late in the dog-days, if reached at all.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If it is debated on one side, we want to be heard upon the other. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. It is not a resolution, but a motion.

Mr. WALSH. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia what day he proposes to set apart for the consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. The proposition is not debatable.

Mr. TAYLOR. I shall have to vote against the gentleman's motion, unless I know what day or days he proposes to set apart.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He intends to put the bill upon its passage now.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is on the motion to take up the Senate bill authorizing the construction of six steam frigates.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman from Virginia propose to bring the Senate bill in here, and put it on its passage under the operation of the previous question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is the proposition.

Mr. JONES. I hope such a departure from all rules will not be allowed.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The gentleman from Virginia moves to suspend the rules to take up and dispose of a bill of the following title:

An act to authorize the construction of six steam frigates, and for other purposes.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 127, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Appleton, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Benson, Boccock, Breckinridge, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chastain, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clingman, Colquitt, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Cullom, Cutting, Dawson, Dean, De Witt, Dick, Disney, Dowdell, Drum, Dunbar, Edmunds, Edmundson, Elliott, Ellison, Etheridge, Ewing, Farley, Faulkner, Florence, Fuller, Gamble, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Grey, Wiley, P. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Hibbard, Hiestor, Keitt, Kurtz, Hunt, Ingersoll, Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Lamb, Latham, Letcher, Lilly, Lindsey, McCulloch, Macdonald, McDougall, McNair, Macy, Maxwell, Mayall, Middleton, Smith Miller, Milson, Morrison, Noble, Mordcau Oliver, Peck, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Pratt, Puryear, Reese, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Robbins, Ruffin, Russell, Sabin, Seymour, Shaw, Shower, Stgleton, Skelton, Samuel A. Washburne, Israel Washburne, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Zollcoffer—127.

NAYS—Messrs. Ball, Bell, Bennett, Boyce, Bridges, Campbell, Caruthers, Clark, Cobb, Craige, John G. So the rules were suspended.

The bill was then taken up, and read a first and second time by its title.

The bill was then read through.

Mr. BOCOCK. The motion which I submitted a few minutes ago, and which has been just voted on by the House, was understood by myself, and almost every other person with whom I have conversed, as a motion to suspend that rule which requires that this bill shall first go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to be considered. I wish to know what the ruling of the Chair is on that point?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that, as the motion was understood and put by him, it was to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking the bill up.

Mr. BOCOCK. My object was to have the bill first considered in the House. The rule of the House is, that a bill of this sort shall be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. My motion was to consider it first here, and that being incompatible with that rule, of course the motion was to suspend that rule. The sense of the House has been tested, and, if necessary, I move to suspend the rule which requires that a bill containing an appropriation shall be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair considers it scarcely regular to move that the rule be suspended which requires a bill to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to be first considered, at the very moment that the motion is submitted to suspend the rules, in order to take it up. Perhaps both motions ought to be embodied in a resolution. The Chair is of the opinion that it would not be regular to couple both the motions as proposed by the gentleman from Virginia. The Chair rules that the bill must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOCOCK. I move to suspend the rule which requires that the bill shall be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAMILTON. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HENN. Is it in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs? It contains an appropriation of three millions of dollars, and should be considered by some committee.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order pending the motion to suspend the rules, otherwise it would be in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If it is in order, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Boccock,] what is the estimated cost of these six steamers?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order. The Chair must arrest everything like a discussion upon a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BOCOCK. I hope the Chair will allow me to answer that question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do so only by the unanimous consent of the House.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen insist upon an enforcement of the rule.

Mr. JONES. Will it be in order to move to suspend the rules, to allow the gentleman to answer that question?

The SPEAKER. It will not. After one order or motion to suspend the rules has been disposed of, it will be in order to submit another, but both cannot be pending at the same time.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 98, nays 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Appleton, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barksdale, Belcher, Benson, Bissell, Boccock, Breckinridge, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clingman, Colquitt, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Dean, De Witt, Dick, Dowdell, Dunbar, Edmunds, Edmundson, Etheridge, Farley, Faulkner, Florence, Fuller, Goodrich, Green, Grey, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Hibbard, Hiestor, Hill, Hughes, Hunt, Ingersoll, Kurtz, Lamb, Latham, Macdonald, McDougall, McNair, Macy, Maxwell, Middleton, Milson, Noble, Packer, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Pratt, Puryear, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Robbins, Ruffin, Russell, Sabin, Seymour, Shaw, Shower, Skelton, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Sollers, Frederick P. Stanton, Straub, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Trout, Tweed, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Walker, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Zollcoffer—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Ball, Barry, Bennett, Boyce, Bridges, Campbell, Caruthers, Clark, Cobb, Craige, Cutting, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dent, Disney, Eastman, Edgerton, Elliott, Ellison, Everhart, Ewing, Fenton, Flagler, Gamble, Giddings, Grow, Hamilton, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kittredge, Knox, Lane, Letcher, Lilly, Lindsey, Lindsey, McCulloch, John McQueen, Matteson, Maurice, Meacham, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morrison, Nichols, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Peck, Peckham, Ready, Reese, Thomas Ritchey, Rowe, Sage, Sapp, Seward, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, Richard H. Stanton, Andrew Stuart, Tracy, Wade, Walbridge, Walsh, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Wells, John Wentworth, Witte, and Yates—80.

So the motion was not agreed to, two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

Mr. BOCOCK. This motion having been lost, I take it for granted that this bill goes, as a matter of course, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It may go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOCOCK. I would state here that this bill is precisely the one which was considered and reported to the House by the Committee on Naval Affairs some time ago. A gentleman from the Senate copied the bill which we had reported, and submitted it to the Senate, and it passed that body verbatim, as we have reported it. It passed the Senate unanimously. Under these circumstances it is not important that it should go again to the Committee upon Naval Affairs. I therefore now move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made the special order for to-morrow week.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would say to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Boccock,] that to-morrow week and the two succeeding days have been set apart for the consideration of local Territorial business.

Mr. BOCOCK. Then I move that it be made the special order for next Thursday week.

Mr. JONES. That is one of the special order days already set apart. They are Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays.

Mr. BOCOCK. Then I would make it to-morrow two weeks.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to say one word before that question is put. I hope the House will consider this matter for a moment, before they make another special order by which they will tie themselves up, nobody knows for how great a length of time hereafter. We have been here three months, and not an appropriation bill of any consequence has been passed yet. The new deficiency bill is still untouched. I hope the House, at least, will so far consider this matter before it makes another special order, as to determine whether it cannot transact its business quite as well by the free exercise of its judgment when questions arise as by tying up its hands in advance, and declaring in advance that it has not confidence; that hereafter, and when the question arises, it will be able to act properly.

Mr. BOCOCK. As the gentleman has been permitted to make those remarks, I hope I may be permitted to reply to them. I want to know what the gentleman means by his remarks in reference to this House tying up its hands? If he means by it that the House ties up its hands when a particular measure comes up before another matter, I say that the very rules of this House tie up its hands. Are we not obliged to consider some things before others? We must have business come up in some order, and how does the fact of making this bill the special order for a particular day tie up the House any more than anything else?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Virginia submit his proposition in writing, or state it again? Does the gentleman mean to make the bill the special order for to-morrow two weeks, and to continue from day to day until disposed of? Is it the purpose of the gentleman to give the matter one day or more?

Mr. BOCOCK. I will include two days, to-morrow week and the next day.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The first question is, then, upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does it not require a two-third vote to make it a special order?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. LILLY. If this bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, without making it a special order, will it not be in the power of that committee to take it up at any time?

The SPEAKER. It is in the power of the committee to take up any bill upon the Calendar. The question is now upon the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ORR. I see, in looking at the Calendar, that the bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs stands the fifth upon the docket in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FLORENCE. Did I understand the Speaker to say that a majority of the House is competent to consider a bill referred to the Committee of the Whole at any time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did so decide.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is it now in order to move to proceed to consider bills upon the Calendar?

The SPEAKER. Not being in committee, it would not be in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Would it be in order to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider that bill upon the Calendar? The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Orr] referred to the fact that more than two months ago, the Committee on Naval Affairs reported a bill, in substance, precisely what this bill is. That bill is upon the Calendar, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and I ask whether it be in order now to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with special reference to the consideration of that bill?

The SPEAKER. The motion would not be in order. It would be in order to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but there is already a privileged question before the House. The Chair decides that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and there being no motion to refer it to any one of the standing committees of the House, the Chair orders the bill to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, without a vote. The question arises upon making the bill the special order for to-morrow and the next day two weeks.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will the Chair allow me a single word upon this matter? I do not desire to trouble the House—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not desire to debate the question at all. I merely wish to make an inquiry, and not to make a speech. But to ascertain how to pursue that course under the rules of the House, as will best attain the purpose I have in view, to secure the immediate passage of this bill, if possible to do so to-day. The pressing importance of it, in my judgment, is very great. Appearances and advices from abroad indicate a protracted European Continental war of the most sanguinary character, and, in that event, it is the duty of the Government to afford protection to vessels of our commercial marine, sailing under the flag of our country; besides, to prevent spoiliations upon our commerce with the world, and, generally, to insure safety to our citizens and flag everywhere. The resources of the American Navy are not, at present, sufficiently large for that purpose. The loss by revenue from customs alone, will, in all probability, in a few years, more than pay the cost of building and equipping the six steamers provided for in this bill, independently of the loss of property and life which may occur, if adequate means of protection is not speedily afforded to prevent it. Prudence, economy, and duty, all prompt speedy action; and it is in obedience to the universal sentiment pervading the hearts of the great masses of the American people. I hope this House will act promptly and properly upon this important subject.

The SPEAKER. The question now pending is the motion made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Boccock], to suspend the rules so as to make the bill under consideration the special order for to-morrow and the next day two weeks.

Mr. JONES, of New York. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WALSH demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The question was then taken; and there were—ayes 91, noes 48.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays were demanded and refused upon this proposition.

So (two thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

PAYMENT OF EXPENSES IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. GALLEGOS (Mr. PHELPS acting as interpreter) offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to inquire into the expediency and propriety of provision being made for the payment of the compensation due to the civil officers employed in the Territory of New Mexico, while it was under military government, and of refunding to that Territory the sum paid said officers from its treasury, as a part of said compensation, according to the report of the Secretary of War to Congress, contained in the Senate Executive Document, No. 71, parts 1 and 2, Thirty-Second Congress, first session.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask whether this is a resolution of inquiry, or whether it proposes definite action?

Mr. PHELPS. It is merely a resolution of inquiry.

The resolution was then considered and agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. GREEN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported, as correctly enrolled, bills of the following titles; which received the signature of the Speaker:

An act for the relief of Mary C. Hamilton;

An act granting five years' half pay to the widow of captain James W. Gunnison;

An act for the relief of Adam D. Steuart, a paymaster in the United States Army;

An act for the relief of Allen G. Johnson; and

An act for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth C. Smith, of Missouri.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. MILLER. On Friday last the Committee of Elections reported a resolution to this House, declaring that the sitting Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico was entitled to his seat upon this floor. That report and resolution were concurred in by the House without investigation, without consideration, and without even having been printed and laid upon the tables of the members of the House.

Governor Lane, the contestant, as is known to the members of the House, was not entitled to a place upon this floor, nor could he occupy a seat here, until the contest had been decided by the House in his favor. He was not notified by the chairman, or any member of the committee, that the report would be made upon that day, nor did he know that it was made until he was subsequently informed of the fact, and after the resolution had been acted upon by the House.

The report and resolution were concurred in, and the vote by which it was concurred in was afterwards reconsidered, and the motion to reconsider laid upon the table; thus closing up the whole matter without the slightest investigation upon the part of the House, and without affording the contestant the slightest opportunity of investigating the report, or of presenting his claims before the House and the country.

I am but little familiar with the mode of procedure in cases of this kind, but it does strike me that it would be eminently proper, when the right of a member or delegate in this House is a matter of contest, that it should not be passed over more hurriedly than other matters of ordinary legislation.

I deem it due to Governor Lane to say that he desires the House and the country to know that he wishes his claim examined, not from personal considerations, but because he believes it due to those who sent him here; for he comes here at the instance and urgent solicitation of many of the people of New Mexico, to assert his right to the seat, and he asks that his claim should be investigated. I think such an investigation eminently proper in this case, for the reason that, upon the credentials presented by the sitting member, it appears that there were gross irregularities in the election, and that the Governor and Secretary of State, who made out those credentials, and gave the certificate to the sitting member, excluded from the count several hundred votes; and it also appears, from the report of the Committee of Elections, that there was great irregularity in the election.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is aware that the subject is not debatable.

Mr. MILLER. I am aware of that fact, and I am only prefacing the motion which I intend to submit with this statement, in order that the House may act understandingly on the question. I ask the indulgence of the House that I may make this statement as an act of justice to a claimant who cannot be heard upon this floor unless an opportunity is afforded him by reconsidering the action of the House last Friday. I make the motion, which I am about to submit, as an act of courtesy and justice to him; for I think it due to him that he should be heard in the matter.

I was remarking, that it appears upon the credentials of the sitting member that hundreds of votes were excluded by the Governor and Secretary of the Territory in making out the count; and, if I understand the report of the Committee of Elections aright, that committee also report that great irregularities did exist in the election, not only in the manner in which it was held, but in the returns which were made. I hold, therefore, that it is right and proper that the House should have before them the report which was made. I was not present at the time the report was made on Friday last, and do not know whether that report was read through, but from my own knowledge of the complicated case presented by the contestant, I am sure it is utterly impossible for the House to understand it without an investigation of the report after it shall have been printed.

Sir, I deem it but an act of justice to the contestant, who has no right to a seat on this floor, when that report was presented, that his claim shall receive at least that consideration and investigation which is accorded to the humblest claimant who presents his claim here for dollars and cents; it is worthy of such consideration, because it involves a high and sacred right and privilege—because it involves the purity of the elective franchise itself. If, as the committee report, irregularities did exist in the election in New Mexico, I hold that it is due to the people of that Territory that this House should so act upon the question that those irregularities may be prevented for the future. It may be said that the Territory of New Mexico embraces a large population, who are unacquainted with our language and our laws. That is true, I presume. But ignorance of the law is no justification for its violation. These irregularities in elections should be checked, and the election laws observed, if we would preserve unimpaired this great franchise of the citizen. And I understand that this is not the only election in which such irregularities have occurred.

I have understood that irregularities existed in the first election which was held in the Territory for a Delegate to Congress. And the gentleman who was defeated in that canvass was urged to contest the election there, but declined to do it. And I understand from the contestant here, that he was urged by men of all parties in New Mexico to come here to contest the right of the sitting member; and he holds that it is not only an act of justice to himself, but an act of justice to those whom he believes he is entitled to represent upon this floor, that his case should be heard; that the matter should be investigated by this House, and that their judgment should be passed on it after full and thorough investigation.

I now appeal to this House, whether they have given this case, involving the rights and interests of the people of New Mexico, that full and fair investigation which will enable each member on this floor to say that he voted understandingly when he voted to sustain the report of this committee? This is all we ask. And, sir, for the purpose of having the matter fully investigated, I submit the motion that the rules be suspended, to enable me to take from the table of the House the resolution submitted by the Committee of Elections, not for the purpose of considering it now, but for the purpose of bringing it again before the House after the report has been printed, and laid upon the tables of members, so that when called on to vote they may vote understandingly. If this be done, the contestant and the people of the Territory will be satisfied.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I trust that the House will indulge me in making a few remarks in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman made the report from the committee, and certainly ought to be indulged.

There was no objection to the gentleman proceeding to reply.

Mr. STANTON. The report was made last Friday, and it was not without calm and attentive consideration by the committee who were intrusted with the duty of doing so. Both the parties were before the Committee on Elections. The investigation occupied a period of more than two months. The committee met sometimes once, sometimes twice, and I believe as often as three times a week. The parties had every facility afforded them for the purpose of making a thorough and searching examination with all the facts connected with the subject. Why, sir, we postponed the proceedings for more than two weeks, in order that Colonel Lane might himself scrutinize every paper and every figure which was on them. Well, after hearing both sides, after examining all the testimony, the committee were unanimously of the opinion that Colonel Lane had no shadow of right.

It is true that an attempt was made to show, not fraud in the voters, not fraud in the manner of conducting the election, but that fraud had been committed in making the returns—not in altering or changing the returns, but in the manner in which they were communicated to the Secretary of the Territory. We regard that as a mere irregularity, and the report admits on its face that there was irregularity in making the returns. The forms of elections, as laid down by the law, are complex and difficult. Those who had to carry them out did not understand the language. It was a new country, the government just organized, and great allowances ought necessarily to be made for that condition of things. The committee were disposed to make it, in the absence of all fraud on the part of the voters, the candidates, or anybody else concerned.

The gentleman says that the certificate of election which was given to the sitting member, Señor GALLEGO, showed on its face that certain votes had been excluded. The gentleman misapprehended the fact. His credentials show no such thing; but there is a certificate from the secretary of the Territory, giving an abstract of all the votes, and making three or four calculations, each one differing from the other.

Mr. RICHARDSON, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to ask him a single question? Did I understand the gentleman to say that the canvassing officer did not undertake to purge the poll-book?

Mr. STANTON. I say the Secretary of the Territory submits the certificates, and sends them here with the papers, in which—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to another point. JOSE MANUEL GALLEGO is admitted here upon the certificate of the Governor. It was irregular, but it was not such an irregularity as to exclude him, I admit. The Governor, in making out the list of votes, and giving a certificate, takes away from each one of the candidates some several hundred votes, (or else I have greatly mistaken the certificate,) and it is that to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. STANTON. I intended to explain that matter; and it is susceptible of an easy explanation. The certificate of the Secretary contains four calculations. In the first he sets down such votes as are not disputed; and in that he comes up perfectly to the requirements of the law. In that calculation he excludes returns where the poll-books do not show where each man's name is numbered, from one down to the end of the list. In another instance he excludes those which have the numbers, but do not indicate, upon the face of the poll-books, for whom each individual voted. The law requires that there shall be an abstract containing that information, which shall accompany the poll-book; and it requires that the list of votes shall be sent to the Secretary of the Territory. In the next column he excludes all votes which were excepted to. In the third column he makes no exclusion.

In the fourth column, which is the true basis of calculation, he admits all the votes polled at the election. There is no proof that any of those votes were fraudulently cast. Of all the votes cast at the election, we have excluded only some two hundred odd, polled by the Pueblo Indians, who, under the law of the Territory, had no right to vote.

The law requires that the probate judge shall organize the election and appoint officers to conduct it, and shall furnish them with poll-books. The probate judge in this case did not discharge that duty, for the reason that the law did not require him to do it. But the Indians met, and organized themselves into an election district, and appointed their chiefs as judges; and afterwards, in the town meetings held the elections and sent up the returns. The committee have only excluded those two hundred and eight Indian votes.

Mr. MILLER. I stated that the credentials submitted by the sitting Delegate presented the fact that there was irregularity in the election. The gentleman joins issue with me upon that question. I hold in my hand a copy of the certificate of the Secretary of State, and I beg leave to call the attention of the gentleman to it. I will read a portion of it:

"I, W. S. Misservy, Secretary of the Territory of New Mexico, do hereby certify that on September 20, A. D. 1853, and in the presence of the Governor of said Territory, I proceeded to count the returns of the votes given at a general election held on the fifth day of September last, for a Delegate to the Thirty-Third Congress of the United States, and that counting the entire vote as returned to this office by the several prefects, the result stands as follows:

Jose Manuel Gallegos received.....	4,971 votes.
William Carr Lane received.....	4,526 "
Majority for Jose Manuel Gallegos.....	455 "

And that after throwing out of the count such returns as were not made in strict accordance with law, the result stands as follows:

Jose Manuel Gallegos received.....	2,806 votes.
William Carr Lane received.....	2,267 "
Majority for Jose Manuel Gallegos.....	539 "

Therefore I, the said W. S. Misservy, Secretary as aforesaid, do hereby certify that the said Jose Manuel Gallegos was and is duly elected the Delegate from said Territory to the Thirty-Third Congress of the United States, according to law."

This shows that the Governor and Secretary excluded over four thousand votes, and yet the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] says that there was no irregularity, and no votes excluded by the Governor and Secretary in their count, because of irregularity or illegality.

Mr. STANTON. The Governor and secretary did make the calculation, and did present it, and the committee had to examine these credentials. The question was, whether these votes were irregularly excluded. The committee came to the unanimous conclusion that, though there were irregularities in the returns, yet they ought not to be excluded, because they were not of a character to justify the exclusion. The Secretary himself does not say that they were excluded, because he presented the other calculation, and upon the result of that calculation he gives a certificate.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MILLER] complains that the committee did not give Colonel Lane notice that we intended to present this report to the House. It is possible that we may have done wrong in that respect, but I do not know that it was our duty to inform Colonel Lane as to the character of the report which we intended to make. I did not know that the gentleman from Missouri desired to contest this matter, for if I had known that he or any other gentleman desired to be present at the meeting of the committee, and discuss this matter, I should have been courteous enough to have given him the opportunity of doing so. I did not know that it was the desire of Colonel Lane to discuss the matter. He had requested me to present his case. I did so, and the report made by the committee was presented to the House. I made no motion to stop debate, or call the previous question, or press for a vote upon it, and when I presented it, I made no remarks. I did not even make a motion to put the resolution upon its passage. It seems to me, that the House ought not to open the question again.

Mr. HAVEN. What is the precise motion before the House?

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is to suspend the rules so as to enable the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MILLER] to make a motion to take from the table a motion to reconsider the vote of the House, adopting the report made by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to say but a word. I doubt not the Committee of Elections are satisfied with the conclusion at which they have arrived in this matter. That is not now the question before the House. If we are to take the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] as a sound one, then there is no necessity for investigating any matter that is reported by a committee of this House, if it be merely sufficient that a majority report for or against it. I desire only that the same course shall be pursued in the investigation of this case which is pursued in a matter of dollars and cents. When the committee of which I am a member—the Committee of Claims—make a report, and introduce a bill or resolution appropriating $100 out of the Treasury for the payment of a just claim, it is not taken for granted by the House that that appropriation ought to be made because the committee recommend it, but the question is referred to a Committee of the Whole House, where it may be sifted and examined. I think that we should at least be willing to adopt such a rule upon a question involving the right of a Delegate or a Representative to a seat upon this floor. That is all we ask.

There are gentlemen all around me, and I doubt not there are gentlemen all over the House, who are wholly unacquainted with the facts in this case. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] says that it is only a question of irregularity; that there is no fraud in the case. I can well imagine that there may be questions of this character so grossly violating the law as to vitiate an election, and cases in which neither of the contestants should be admitted to a seat upon this floor; but they should be sent back to the people, that such irregularities might be corrected, and the election conducted in pursuance of the law. The contestant holds in this case that there has been such irregularity. I desire an opportunity, not only to decide upon the merits of this case for myself, but I desire that the gentleman who contests the right of the sitting Delegate upon this floor should have justice done to him, and that the people of the Territory may be satisfied that the House has given the application of the contestant that fair and impartial hearing which is due to every citizen who presents a claim for the consideration of this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen of the House will recollect that, after the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections was adopted by the House, a motion was made to reconsider, and the motion to reconsider laid upon the table. The gentleman from Missouri now moves to suspend the rules, to enable him to submit a motion that the report may again be taken from the table and considered.

Mr. HAVEN. If the House will permit me, I will say, that although I am not acquainted with the merits of this controversy, I do not doubt that the Committee of Elections have faithfully discharged their duty; and I do not understand that the application of the gentleman from Missouri looks to the impeaching of their integrity, or the correctness with which they have examined into the matter; not at all. I understand him to put it upon the ground that this is a subject upon which the House has no particular knowledge, and which has been acted upon with more precipitation than is usually manifested upon a case of mere ordinary importance; and, inasmuch as it involves a principle connected with the elective franchise, and for the purpose of securing an intelligent investigation into matters of this kind, upon which the uprightness and independence of the members of this House hinges, I would submit whether it would not be better to place the subject at least in a condition where the House can give to the constituents of the sitting Delegate from New Mexico their intelligent opinion, after a proper investigation, that he is rightfully entitled to the seat which he occupies. It seems to me that the resolution is a fair one, and I hope the House will entertain and adopt it.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I desire simply to inquire whether the resolution which was passed the other day was passed under the operation of the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It was not. The previous question was not demanded upon its passage.

Mr. STANTON. I would like the House to understand the length of time the subject was under consideration; whether a long report was not read in the hearing of the House, concluding with the resolution; and then whether it was not deliberately adopted, without any motion or effort upon the part of any one to postpone its disposition?

The SPEAKER. The report was read at the Clerk's desk, and the question was put upon the adoption of the resolution, without any discussion, or any motion upon the part of any member.

Mr. HUNT. If the action of the House, in the adoption of this resolution, has been unadvised or precipitate, it becomes the character of this House to reconsider its action, and give the subject a proper share of deliberation. There is no imputation intended to be cast upon the honorable Committee of Elections. The members of that committee are doubtless satisfied with the correctness of the conclusion to which they have come, but members around me say that they are not in possession of the facts in this case, and that an intelligent judgment has not been given upon it. I hope, therefore, in order that justice may be done in a matter which concerns the representation of the people, that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri will prevail.

The question "Shall the rules be suspended?" was put; and, upon a division, sixty-four rose in the affirmative.

Mr. MILLER. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether a quorum of members are in the House, but the yeas and nays will show.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 87, nays 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Bell, Bennett, Benson, Bridges, Brooks, Campbell, Caruthers, Caskie, Chandler, Cook, Cox, Crocker, Curtis, Dawson, Dean, DeWitt, Dick, Eastman, Edmonds, Edmundson, Etheridge, Flagler, Gamble, Goodrich, Greenwood, Grey, Grow, Andrew J. Harlan, Harrison, Haven, Henn, Hill, Hunt, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, Kerr, Kidwell, Kittredge, Knox, Kurtz, Leitcher, Lindley, McCulloch, McDougall, Macy, McEacham, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Milson, Norton, Mordecai Oliver, Peckham, Powell, Pratt, Preston, Puryear, Ready, Richardson, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchie, Sabin, Sage, Sapp, Seward, Seymour, Shaw, Singleton, Gerrit Smith, Snodgrass, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Tracy, Truitt, Tweed, Upham, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, Hendrick B. Wright, Yates, and Zollieffer—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Belcher, Bissell, Biscock, Boyce, Breckinridge, Chamberlain, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Craige, Cutting, John G. Davis, Disney, Dunham, Ellison, English, Everhart, Fenton, Florence, Hamilton, Hastings, Hendricks, Hester, George W. Jones, Lane, Lilly, Lindsay, McQueen, Matson, Maurice, Morrison, Nichols, Peck, Robbins, Ruffin, Russell, Skelton, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Thurston, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walsh, and John Wentworth—50.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

OCEAN MAIL STEAMERS.

Mr. WALKER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House whether, in his opinion, the steamships employed in the ocean mail service of the United States are of proper construction to be converted into vessels of war, in the event of the occurrence of an emergency requiring their use for such purpose; and if so, how many, and which of them.

Mr. WALSH. I object to the consideration of that resolution now.

Mr. WALKER. I move to suspend the rules, to enable me to offer the resolution.

The question was put, and (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and it was agreed to.

DELEGATE FROM NEW MEXICO.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to enable me to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. JOSE M. GALLEGOS, Delegate from New Mexico, be allowed to introduce within the doors of the Hall of the House of Representatives, a person to act as his interpreter, in order that he may more effectually understand and participate in the proceedings of this body.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. I object to that resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The purpose of the resolution is not to introduce upon the floor an interpreter, but it is to give him permission to come inside the House. Mr. GALLEGOS does not understand one word of the English language, which is the misfortune of his constituents; and this is not for his personal convenience, but for the convenience of the people that he represents. I move to suspend the rules, to enable me to offer the resolution.

The question was then taken, and (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. EASTMAN. What is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The call of States for resolutions.

Mr. EASTMAN. Well, I hope the States will be called in their regular order, commencing where the last call left off.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. ORR. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to enable me to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the seventeenth rule be so amended as to admit within the Hall of the House of Representatives the Assistant Secretaries of the State and Treasury Departments, Ministers and ex-Ministers of the United States to foreign Governments, and heads of bureaus.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to that; we have enough on the floor already.

Mr. ORR. I move to suspend the rules, and I ask that the Clerk may read the 17th rule as it stands at present. The House will see that the rule now admits officers of an inferior grade to those enumerated in my resolution upon the floor of the House.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I will never consent that any other persons shall be admitted upon this floor, unless it is provided that they shall not be claim agents.

Mr. JONES. Exclude all the ex-members who are claim agents.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Yes; too many of the ex-members are claim agents.

Mr. ORR. I do not object to the amendment of the rule in that respect, if gentlemen desire it; but I think that consistency requires that the officers included in my resolution shall be admitted, unless some of those now admitted are to be excluded. I hope the rule will be read.

The Clerk read the 17th rule; which is as follows:

"No person, except members of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments, Treasurer, Comptrollers, Register, Auditors, President's Secretary, Chaplains to Congress, Judges of the United States, Foreign Ministers and their Secretaries, officers who, by name, have received or shall hereafter receive the thanks of Congress for their gallantry and good conduct displayed in the service of their country, the Governor for the time being of any State or Territory in the Union, such gentlemen as have been heads of Departments or members of either branch of the National Legislature, the members of the Legislatures, for the time being, the States and Territories, and, at the discretion of the Speaker, persons who belong to such Legislatures of foreign Governments as are in amity with the United States, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives; and no person not known to the Doorkeeper to be entitled to the privilege of the floor shall enter the Hall unless the Doorkeeper shall be informed by a member that the individual is entitled to admission under this rule, and in what capacity."

The SPEAKER. There is another rule bearing on this subject, which will be read, if there is no objection.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina will be read first.

The Clerk again reported the resolution.

Mr. HESTER. Did I understand the Chair to say that there was another rule bearing on this subject?

The SPEAKER. There was a rule adopted at the present session requiring a register to be kept, in which the names of persons claiming the privilege of the floor should be kept, and the grounds on which they claim it. The motion is to suspend the rules, for the purpose of introducing the resolution which has been read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask that the rule adopted at the present session may be read.

The SPEAKER. It has not been inserted, as yet, among the printed rules.

Mr. JONES. The House has virtually determined that the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury was a mere clerk.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Yes, sir; an inferior officer. [Laughter.]

The question was then taken, and the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. BELL, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

A bill to authorize the President to incorporate the officers of the late Texas navy into the Navy of the United States.

Mr. EASTMAN. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of dividing the State of Wisconsin into two judicial districts.

The question was put; and, on a division, there were—ayes 40—

Mr. EASTMAN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania, and CLINGMAN, were appointed.

Mr. FLORENCE asked that the resolution be again read; but it was objected to by Mr. WALSH.

The question was taken, and the resolution was adopted, the tellers having reported—ayes 71, noes not counted.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT MILWAUKIE.

Mr. WELLS, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

A bill to provide for the purchase of a site, and the erection of a suitable building thereon, in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for a custom-house, and to contain suitable rooms for the United States courts, and post office; referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CODIFYING THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. CURTIS asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution; which was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the expenses of codifying and revising the revenue laws.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That bill provides for an appropriation, and I think it best not to take it out of the Committee of the Whole. I therefore object to its introduction.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I move to suspend the rules, to allow me to introduce the resolution.

Mr. BENSON. I would inquire whether the call of States for resolutions has been completed?

The SPEAKER. It has not; but, pending the call, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIS] rose and offered a resolution, and moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to do so. That motion is in order, and is pending.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to, two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave, to introduce a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

A bill to amend an act entitled an act to create an additional collection district in the Territory of Oregon, and for other purposes.

Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LANE also, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

A bill authorizing the payment by the Secretary of the Treasury of certain drafts drawn by Lieutenant ——— Dement for the ransom of American citizens, prisoners of the Indians of Queen Charlotte Island, and for other purposes.

Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MILLER, of Missouri. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to pay to William Carr Lane, who has contested the seat of JOSE MANUEL GALLEGOS, as Delegate from New Mexico, the per diem and mileage allowed to the Delegate from said Territory, from the commencement of this session up to this date.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to debate that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee proposes to debate the resolution, and, of course, it goes over under the rules.

Mr. MILLER. Is it not in order for me to move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The resolution was not received by the House, and it is in order for the gentleman from Missouri to make that motion.

Mr. MILLER. I move then to suspend the rules, so that I may introduce the resolution I have submitted.

Mr. JONES. It takes two thirds, of course, to suspend the rules.

The question was then taken upon Mr. MILLER's motion, and, upon division, there were—ayes 50, noes not counted.

Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered—27 gentlemen rising in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. HESTER, the House then adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The President pro tempore presented a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting seventy-five copies of the official Army Register for 1854.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, I have been requested to present to the Senate the proceedings of a public meeting, held in Baltimore on the 17th of February. Several resolutions were adopted at that meeting. One of them asks that the soldiers of the war of 1812 may be allowed bounty lands; another, that the provisions of the pension acts relative to the officers and soldiers, and their widows, of the revolutionary war, may be extended to the officers and soldiers, and their widows, of the war of 1812; another resolution asks that the pensions may commence from the date of the wounds and disabilities. Although these are separate matters, it is scarcely worth while to divide them, and therefore I move to refer the whole proceedings to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHASE. I have been requested to present and call the attention of the Senate to the proceedings of a mass meeting of German citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri compromise. I am informed by a gentleman whom I know very well, that this meeting was very largely and numerously attended by the German electors, of the highest respectability and character in that city. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOUCEY presented a petition of citizens of Middletown, Connecticut, remonstrating against any infringement of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EVERETT presented a memorial of citizens of Barnstable, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of the Nebraska bill in its present form; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Erie county, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the Nebraska bill in its present form; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FISH presented a remonstrance, numerously signed by citizens of Montgomery county, New York, against the repeal or alteration of the Missouri compromise act of 1820; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER presented the following memorials, remonstrating against the passage of the Nebraska bill in its present form; which were ordered to lie on the table:

Petition of citizens of Wilbraham, Massachusetts;

Two memorials of citizens of Leicester, Massachusetts;

Petition of citizens of Middlebury, Indiana; and Five petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania.

Mr. FISH presented a petition of merchants and ship owners of New York, praying the enactment of a law to facilitate the unloading of the cargoes of ships arriving in the ports of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill relating to the subject.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a petition of citizens of New Castle county, State of Delaware, remonstrating against any infringement of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHASE presented the following petitions, &c., praying the enactment of laws to prevent the increase, to mitigate the evils, and to promote the final eradication of slavery; which were ordered to lie on the table:

Petition of citizens of Miami and Montgomery counties, Fredericktown and vicinity;

Petition of citizens of Youngstown, Mahoning county, Ohio;

Petition of Robert Eyre and others, citizens of Fayette county, Ohio;

Resolutions of citizens of Leeburg and vicinity, Carroll county, Ohio;

Proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Fayette county, Ohio;

Petition of citizens of Galena county, Ohio;

Petition of citizens of Gallia county, Ohio; and Petition of Samuel Hamilton and other citizens of South Salem, Ross county, Ohio.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition of inhabitants of Kennebunk and Kennebunk Port, York county, Maine, who were detained as prisoners of war in Dartmoor and other English prisons and prison-ships, during the last war with Great Britain, praying to be granted pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the petition of James Edwards, the petition of the administrator of Edward M. Wanton, and the petition of the executors of Nehemiah Brush, praying compensation for loss of property in the war with the Seminoles, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of James Edwards and others; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following petitions, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed:

Petition of Jane A. Wight; and Petition of citizens of Steuben county, New York, in behalf of Isaac Ackerman.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James Wormsley, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PETTIT asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way to the States of Indiana and Illinois, and a portion of the public lands, to aid in the construction of a certain railroad in said States, known as the Indiana and Illinois Central railway; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SLIDELL asked, and obtained the unanimous consent, to introduce a bill for the relief of the Pine Grove Academy, in Louisiana; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SLIDELL asked, and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate, to introduce a bill to authorize the issuance of patents for lands in Louisiana in certain cases; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALKER. In pursuance of previous notice, I now ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Sylvester Petibone. I do not design to move its reference to any committee, but I ask that it may be read a first time, with the promise that I will make a statement to the Senate in regard to it, as I am familiar with the whole case.

The bill was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. FITZPATRICK, in accordance with previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting public lands in aid of the construction of a railroad from Beard's Bluff, on the Tennessee river, in Alabama, to Nasketa, Mississippi, via Tuscaloosa, Northport, and Gainesville, in Alabama; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LAND GRANT TO FLORIDA.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to reconsider the vote of yesterday by which a bill making a grant of land to the State of Florida, to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, was passed. I ask it for the purpose of submitting an amendment, to insert after the word "Jacksonville," one of the termini of the road, the words "or Fernandino," so that that place may be made a terminus. It is within a short distance of Jacksonville, only some fifty or sixty miles. It may be desirable to make that the terminus, and the amendment will leave it in the option of the Legislature to take either of the points.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS.

Mr. STUART. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill for the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands, have instructed me to report it back. I desire to have the bill read now, for the purpose of asking the Senate to consider it at this time. It is one that requires immediate action.

The Senate, as in the Committee of the Whole, accordingly proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to direct that when lands granted to the several States by the act of September 20, 1850, to enable the State of Arkansas, and other States, to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits have been sold or located since the passage of the act, the purchase money shall be paid over to the State for such of the lands as have been sold, and the Governor, by his agents, may select other lands in lieu of those located by warrants and scrip upon the surrender to the United States of all title or claim on the part of the United States to the lands granted, which have been entered or located, or any part of them, and that upon such surrender the title in fee to the purchasers shall pass by United States patent; and wherever any State has sold the lands by mistake as swamp lands which still belong to the United States, the purchaser shall, upon the payment of the purchase money into the land office of the district in which the land lies, or if the money has been already paid to the State, then upon the presentation of receipts or proofs of such payment, the United States patent shall pass the fee-simple of the same.

Mr. STUART. I am instructed to move to strike out all that portion of the bill which has been read last, and which relates to mistakes in sales by the States. I apprehend that if there are any such mistakes, they are very few. My own opinion is that there are none; but if there are, they are such errors as can easily be provided for by the State itself. It produces no difficulty between the respective States and the General Government. I therefore move to strike out all that part of the bill, so as only to leave the part to provide for errors which have been inevitable in entries which have been made since the passage of the law granting these lands to the States. Without this, I have a long communication from the Commissioner of the Land Office, stating that great difficulty will continue, and that they are almost in inextricable confusion in the office.

The amendment was agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Michigan, whether it would not be well to extend the provision of this bill to the holders of land warrants, in case the lands upon which they have located have been sold by an error.

Mr. STUART. I will suggest to the Senator from Iowa, that that amendment would be very much out of place in this bill, and I think it might embarrass it in its passage in the other House; that is the only objection I have to it.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Then I will not press it. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

RICHARD M. YOUNG.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to Richard M. Young $974 20, the amount of his per diem and compensation allowed him by the President as special commissioner to investigate the charges against the Hon. Alexander Ramsey, late Superintendent of Indian Affairs of Minnesota Territory, under a resolution of the Senate of the 5th of April, 1853; and that the same be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT. As this resolution proposes to appropriate money out of the contingent fund, it must go, under the rules, to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have the resolution considered now, without a reference.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolution will now have its second reading.

The resolution was read a second time.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. If it provokes any discussion, I will consent that it may go over.

Mr. STUART. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas if there is any recommendation from the Department for the payment of this sum.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. There is an official statement from the Secretary of the Interior that this amount is due, and would have been paid out of the contingent fund of that Department, but for the fact that that fund was exhausted by the payment of the other expenses of the commission. These expenses are properly chargeable to the contingent fund either of the Senate or of the Department of the Interior. There is no question about that, for the whole investigation arose under the order of the Senate. The only reason why the matter has been brought here, is, because the contingent fund of the Department of the Interior has been exhausted by the payment of the other expenses of this commission.

Mr. STUART. I do not wish to indicate any opposition to the resolution, but I ask that it may lie over, in order that we may have an opportunity of looking into it.

The PRESIDENT. The objection being made, the resolution must go over.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I have no objection to the postponement.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

INDIGENT INSANE.

On motion by Mr. FOOT, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making a grant of public lands to the several States and Territories of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. PETTIT, on the 9th instant, when the bill was under consideration, to insert the following:

Provided, That all the grants of land provided for by this act shall be confined to such States as have public lands in them equal to the amount hereby granted to such State."

Mr. PETTIT. I rise, sir, not to detain the Senate in the consideration of this bill, but for the purpose of withdrawing the amendment which I offered to it. In doing so, I wish simply to state that I do not withdraw it because I yield the idea that to the new States their own territory and land ought to belong. That, I hold, should have been the early policy of the Government; and, so far as my vote now can go towards securing to them what they ought to have had originally, I shall be found pursuing such a course. But since we have been informed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Dodge] that there is more insanity and lunacy, not to say idiocy, in the old northern free States than in the western and southern States, it may be a matter of philanthropy and justice to pass the bill as a remedy for that afflicted class. In this state of things I will withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Senator will have leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. FOOT. I wish to offer an amendment, which is recommended by the Committee on Public Lands. Before doing so, allow me to say that I am entirely satisfied with the act of the Senator from Indiana in withdrawing his amendment, without indorsing his reason, or taking time, at present, to combat it. The Committee on Public Lands have authorized and directed me to move to amend the first section of the substitute reported by them, by striking out the words—

"And that the representation of any State shall not be computed at less than six members," and to insert in lieu thereof:

"And that said apportionment shall be made after first allotting to each State one hundred thousand acres."

The Committee on Public Lands bestowed very much reflection and study upon the question of the proper basis of the distribution of these lands among the several States, having reference not only to the present population of the States, but also to the prospective and more rapidly increasing population of the new States. To distribute these lands among the several States according to their population or representation, would not, in the opinion of the committee, be quite just to the new and less populous States at the present time. To adopt the basis of territorial area, on the other hand, would be doing injustice to the old and more populous States. They adopted then the compound ratio of population or representation and territorial area, with a certain limitation. The committee, after much reflection and consideration upon the subject, came to the conclusion that this constituted the most equitable basis upon which they could propose the distribution of these lands.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to move to strike out a portion of the first section of the substitute reported by the committee, and I do not know to what extent my objection has been obviated by the amendment which has been just submitted. I understand the Senator from Vermont to say that the basis of distribution is a compound one—that of representation in Congress, and the quantity of square miles of land within the limits of the States. Now, by taking either of these, great injustice will be done to the State from whence I come.

You provide that the area of a State shall not be taken to exceed 50,000 square miles. The State of California has nearly 150,000 square miles. You then fix upon the basis of representation in the other branch of Congress. The State of California has but two members there, though she is justly entitled, in my judgment, at this day, to at least four members. This compound ratio, therefore, which has been fixed upon by the Committee on Public Lands, will necessarily do great injustice to that State by fixing upon the quantity of lands to which she is entitled.

Now, whilst I am in favor of the general principles of this bill, I am unwilling that this gross injustice shall be done to the States which have a larger quantity of land than that fixed as a maximum in this bill. I desire, therefore, to move to strike out that portion of the bill which limits the area of the States to fifty thousand square miles, leaving each State to receive a quantity of land in proportion to the amount which may be found within its limits. My State is interested, as well as other States, in providing for this numerous class of people; for there are many insane people there, who have gone from the older States, with the anticipation, perhaps, of making fortunes very suddenly; but finding themselves disappointed in that, have become deranged, and are now charges upon the people of that State for support. Unless my difficulty be obviated by the amendment now proposed, I shall move to strike out that proviso in the first section.

Mr. FOOT. I propose, in order to meet the objection of the Senator from California, to withdraw the amendment which I offered, and in lieu of it, to move to strike out the whole of the proviso as it at present stands, and to insert in lieu of it:

Provided, That said apportionment shall be made after first allotting to each State one hundred thousand acres.

These words are to take the place of the present proviso, which reads:

Provided, That the area of no State shall be computed at more than fifty thousand square miles, and that the representation of any State shall not be computed at less than six members."

Mr. DAWSON. I have a suggestion to make to which I should like to have an answer. As I understand the bill, it proposes to allot to all the States, except the old thirteen—

Mr. FOOT. To all the States—to each of the thirty-one States—one hundred thousand acres is first to be allotted. That will require three millions one hundred thousand acres out of the ten millions of acres proposed to be granted. Then the remaining six millions nine hundred thousand acres will be apportioned upon the compound ratio of representation and territorial area.

Mr. DAWSON. Then it is all right.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon the passage of this bill. I wish to say, however, that I dislike very much to vote against it, considering the purposes to be effected by it. I conceive, however, that this is a much more objectionable mode of disposing of the public lands than the distribution of their proceeds. It is true, that one of the objections which I have had heretofore to the bill—that it made one State a freeholder in another—is obviated by the bill in its present form; yet, a State having no lands within its limits is authorized to sell its land scrip to individuals, and the assignee of the State has the liberty of locating the land within the limits of the new States. What will be the effect of this? It will be, that large bodies of land will fall into the hands of speculators in the different States. This is palpably unjust. There will be a hundred thousand acres of land at first located by each of the old States in a few of the new States, and the lands will be in the hands of speculators, who will, of course, sell them for the very highest possible price which they can get. They hold them up or lease them out.

Now, sir, if Senators from the old States knew the great injury which it is to the new States to have a large body of their best lands in the hands of speculators, they would at once see that it would be a great deal better to provide that the one hundred thousand acres of land, or whatever amount may be assigned to each State, should be sold by the Government, and the proceeds paid over to the different States. This would be much less objectionable, and would do much less injury to the new States than the bill in its present form. This bill involves the same principle as to the disposition of the proceeds of the public lands, against which we have heretofore been fighting; and it is assuming a much more objectionable form in its practical effect upon the country. I shall, therefore, ask for the yeas and nays upon the question of the engrossment of the bill.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. The Senator from Mississippi does not propose to ask for the yeas and nays on that?

Mr. ADAMS. No, sir.

The amendment was agreed to; and the substitute of the committee, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to ask the gentleman who has brought forward this bill, whether it gives authority to any State—for instance, the State which he represents—to locate its land scrip in the State of California? I have not been able to read the bill with a view to ascertain this.

Mr. FOOT. The question has been put to me by several members. The bill has been once read through; but some were then absent, and did not hear its provisions in this respect. I can state to the Senator that, so far from giving such authority to any State to locate these lands in any other State or Territory, it does, in express terms, prohibit any such thing. No State is authorized to locate its share of these lands in any other State or Territory.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to ask another question. Does this bill authorize a State which gets lands to locate those lands within its own territory, if there be vacant lands there?

Mr. FOOT. Certainly, it does.

Mr. GWIN. Then I wish to ask, further—I shall get through with my difficulties in a moment—can that State, if there be no lands there subject to entry at private sale, select such public lands as are within the State?

Mr. FOOT. The bill limits the location to lands subject to private entry at $1 25 per acre at the time.

Mr. GWIN. Although there are millions and tens of millions of acres of land in California, there is not a foot of public land in that condition. There is not a foot of public land there subject to sale at private entry; nor do I believe there will be any for twenty years to come. If the Senator will agree that where there are no such lands in the land States, those States may locate their lands on any of the unappropriated public domain in their own limits, I shall be perfectly willing to agree to it. This bill, however, as it now stands, gives no lands to California; and under its provisions, my State will not be able to get any in twenty years to come, in my opinion. If the Senator will agree to this amendment, that, if, in any of the land States where there are no lands subject to sale at private entry, that State shall select the quantity given in this bill from any other unappropriated public lands, I shall have no objection to the bill.

Mr. FOOT. My construction of the provisions of the bill would be this: That such States as have no public lands subject to private entry at the time, can locate their lands elsewhere in other States or Territories where there are public lands subject to private entry at the time. I have, however, no objection to the Senator from California drawing up an amendment to suit the condition of his own State in that respect, for I presume that is the only State in that condition.

Mr. GWIN. If I can get that amendment, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. DAWSON. Before the Senator from California draws up his amendment, will he be kind enough to explain why there are no public lands in California which can be taken by that State under the provisions of this bill. Is it because they are not surveyed?

Mr. GWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWSON. It is not to be presumed that the Government will allow the public lands to remain in California without being surveyed.

Mr. GWIN. If the Senator will permit me, I will explain the matter in a moment. There are hundreds of thousands of acres of land there which have been located upon by the settlers; and such has been the necessity to provide for those settlers, that we have passed a law through Congress giving them a right to go on the lands before they are surveyed, because the officers cannot survey them fast enough to meet the demands of the settlers. They are surveying that portion which is inhabited, and it is all taken up before the surveys are completed. Every foot of it is now located, and will be for years to come. In a State with such an immense area of public domain, the surveys can progress only at a certain ratio, and they must first survey that portion which is settled, according to the progress of the population; and hence I do not believe that in twenty years to come, there will be an acre of land there subject to sale at private entry. I only wish to meet the necessities of my own State.

Mr. DAWSON. Certainly there can be no difficulty; for in a State so large as California, every lot surveyed by the Government will not be immediately taken up by the settler.

Mr. GWIN. Yes, sir, immediately.

Mr. DAWSON. Then that will be the most astonishing thing in the history of the disposition of our public lands. Our past experience in that respect does not justify any such belief. Now, I would say to the State of California, let the surveys be made in a district of country where this great demand is not existing, and California can get the whole of her lands very easily surveyed. I would rather pass a section of this bill declaring the amount the State of California shall locate, than to give her (a new State, with such an immense quantity of public land, out of which the Government has not yet realized anything) the right of going into another State to select these lands.

Mr. GWIN. I do not want to go into another State. I wish to get the right to have these lands located within our own State.

Mr. DAWSON. Very well.

Mr. HUNTER. I believe the hour for the special order has come, and therefore I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow.

Mr. FOOT. I hope we may have a moment longer to dispose of this question.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the further consideration of the bill will be postponed until to-morrow. I do not believe a vote can be had upon it to-day. The time has come for the special order, on which the Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to.

Mr. FOOT. I would suggest to the Senator from California to move his amendment in this form:

Provided, That California may locate her distributive share of the lands hereby granted within the limits of that State, on any of the public lands, either surveyed or unsurveyed.

Mr. GWIN. That will suit my purpose.

Mr. STUART. There is no provision in this bill to take care of the interest of preëmptors and actual settlers. The very provision which is now under consideration applies to land which is subject to entry at one dollar and a quarter an acre. If the Senator from California expects to secure my vote for such an amendment, he must take care of actual settlers on the public lands.

Mr. GWIN. We have already passed a law at this session giving every settler on unsurveyed land in California the right to the possession of his tract.

Mr. STUART. Precisely. And the effect of this bill will be to give to the State the land, and the jurisdiction over it.

Mr. GWIN. No, sir. It only gives the State the unappropriated public lands. If there are settlers on the lands, they are appropriated, and the State cannot take them.

Mr. STUART. It would be better to add the words "and unoccupied."

Mr. GWIN. I am willing to say, "the unappropriated and unoccupied public lands."

Mr. MASON. The effect of the amendment of the Senator from California, I take it for granted, will be to enable his State to appropriate the richest of the gold lands within her limits.

Mr. GWIN. I am willing to exclude them altogether. They are not to be surveyed. There is an order already not to survey the gold region at all. I am willing, therefore, to insert "other than mineral lands."

Mr. MASON. But it would not be known whether they were mineral lands or not until they were appropriated. I suspect there is a large portion of the surface of the State of California which has not yet been explored, which will be found to be quite rich in mineral wealth.

Mr. GWIN. The mineral region is well defined; and there is no act of Congress, and I am not in favor of passing an act of Congress, appropriating any portion of the mineral lands. All our legislation has been carefully guarded in this respect; and the surveyor general has received express instructions to make no surveys of the mineral region.

Mr. MASON. But these lands are to be appropriated to California, whether surveyed or unsurveyed.

Mr. GWIN. But if the State takes mineral lands, the very words of the law will make the selection void.

Mr. MASON. I am much at a loss to know how the grant could become void after the title had become vested in the State of California, by a subsequent discovery that the lands were in fact mineral lands.

Mr. GWIN. I do not wish to have the further consideration of the bill postponed, or I could show to the Senator at once that the mineral region of California is strictly defined, and is well known there, and no public surveys are going on in that section of the State, nor will there be any until further action by Congress.

Mr. MASON. I am perfectly willing to take the word of the honorable Senator from California for anything about which he is certain; but I submit that he cannot be certain whether the line of the mineral lands is well defined or known. It is a matter of conjecture. It may be that the boundary of the mineral lands is such a parallel, or such water-courses, or such mountains; but it is conjectural, purely conjectural; and the State of California may have boundless mineral wealth in other portions, for aught we know.

I do not mean to throw any embarrassments in the way of the bill; but I suspect that the honorable Senator who moved it, and who is chiefly interested in it, will find that unless we go far beyond the hour assigned for the special order, we cannot get a vote to-day; for I shall feel myself bound to give my reasons for the opposition which I shall make to the bill. I will do so when the bill is ready for its passage. I think, however, that the amendment of the Senator from California may place it in the power of the State of California to appropriate these mineral lands, to the exclusion of the Federal Government.

Mr. FOOT. I hope the question may be taken without further debate.

Mr. GWIN. I have modified my amendment so as to read:

Provided, That the State of California may locate her portion of the said lands upon any of the unappropriated lands in that State, other than mineral lands, and not then occupied by actual settlers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading. On this question the Senator from Mississippi has asked for the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS. Let them be taken on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that the Senator from Virginia proposes to discuss the bill; and I would therefore suggest to my friend from Mississippi that it would be equally as well to take the yeas and nays, after the Senator from Virginia has been heard, on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. I have no objection to withdrawing the call until the question comes up upon the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. MASON. I am perfectly willing to make now the remarks which I feel myself required to make in explanation of my vote upon this bill; and I really do not wish to embarrass at all the action of the Senator from Vermont. It is, however, now after one o'clock, and I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow, and call for the order of the day.

The PRESIDENT. If the Senator objects, the bill cannot have its third reading until to-morrow.

Mr. MASON. I object.

The PRESIDENT. The bill must go over until to-morrow.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. BRODHEAD addressed the Senate in support of the bill. [For speech see Appendix.]

Mr. THOMPSON, of New Jersey, followed on the same side of the question. [See Appendix for his speech.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President—

Mr. STUART. I suppose the Senator will not desire to proceed to-day. I should like to have the subject postponed for the purpose of taking up another bill. With the consent of the Senator, I move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

SOLAR COMPASS.

Mr. STUART. There is a bill on the Calendar, which was objected to some Fridays ago because it was not a private bill, although it stands as such on the Calendar. Perhaps it may be doubted whether that is its true character. It is the bill to enable the United States to make use of the solar compass in the public surveys. I do not think it will lead to discussion. I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The object of the bill is to appropriate $15,000 to compensate William A. Burt for the use, by the United States, in the prosecution of the public surveys, of the solar compass, which he has invented and patented.

The use of Burt's solar compass, which has been expensive in its construction, it is represented has saved the Government a heavy outlay in surveying the mineral lands in Wisconsin, Michigan, Iowa, and Arkansas, as in those mineral districts the ordinary compass was wholly inefficient, local attraction being so great as frequently to prevent the traverse of the needle, causing variations from ten to one hundred and eighty degrees. In 1852 the Commissioner of the General Land Office said that Burt's solar compass has proved of inappreciable utility in the mineral regions of Lake Superior and elsewhere, where the local attraction is such as to render the ordinary compass a useless thing.

In the mineral regions of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Arkansas, it is estimated that 31,104 miles (9,953,280 acres) of public land surveys were accomplished by it, at a maximum cost of $186,624; which, without its discovery and use in that service, could not have been surveyed without resorting to the tedious process involved in the use of transit and other instruments, causing delays in the execution of the work, and proportionably swelling the cost of the public surveys of the same body of land to an estimated amount of at least $622,080, and possibly a great deal more: that is to say, to twenty dollars a mile instead of six dollars, and possibly double the former amount.

Mr. Burt is understood to have been fourteen years in aiming to perfect his invention, and the measure of compensation claimed is one mill on the acre for the results attained by means of the use of his instrument, wherever it was of such indispensable advantage and so economical to the public land surveying service. Such allowance, based on the aggregate amount of acres above specified, would amount to $9,952 for all the past. As regards the future, he claims the extension of the same allowance to twenty-one years from the date of his patent—February 25, 1836—which would reach to February 25, 1857."

The transcendent merits of this instrument in the public land surveys, consists in the facility with which it determines the true meridian, from which, by the mechanical construction and graduation of the compass, any and all angles or courses may be determined. Thus the surveyor, by a simple operation, is enabled to arrive at accurate results; and whatever may be the local causes surrounding him, which but serve to distract the operator with the ordinary compass, he is by this instrument enabled promptly to proceed in his labors without any misgivings, delays, or interruptions.

Nearly twenty years of anxious thought and study, and thousands of dollars, have been spent by him in bringing this instrument to perfection, and eighty dollars is all the remuneration he has received from it.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not mean to dispute the merit of this gentleman's invention; but it seems to me that we shall be introducing a dangerous principle, and setting a bad example by the passage of this bill. The Constitution has provided that inventors shall be rewarded by having secured to them a patent for a limited period. That, it seems to me, is the true mode of providing for inventors. But here is a proposition to give an appropriation directly out of the public Treasury. It may be, that in this particular instance, this gentleman is entitled to what is proposed; but it will be setting an example which will certainly be followed, and which, it seems to me, will lead to a great deal of mischief. When I say that he may perhaps be entitled, I do not mean that he has any just claim against the United States, but I mean to say that this perhaps is as strong a case of that nature as can be presented. But I am against setting such precedents, against beginning with such examples. This may not be the first case of the kind. I recollect others in which inventors have sent a petition to Congress, asking a reward for their discoveries, for which they could not be paid by the community at large. If we once begin this, we shall find that we are beginning to take a troublesome subject of jurisdiction into our hands. Nor do I think that any inventor can claim more of us than that which is accorded to him by the Constitution of the United States—a patent to be issued under our laws. For the rest, we buy his instruments as everybody else does, if we need them. And if it should so happen that he has given his ingenuity a direction in which a profit cannot be reached in money, he must take his chance for that compensation, which is all that many of those who make discoveries and inventions obtain—the reputation and fame which they acquire from them.

Mr. STUART. I certainly did not expect that this bill would produce any discussion in the Senate, particularly after the reading of the report, and the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I beg leave to say in the outset that all I desire, and that, I may say, I do desire, is that every Senator will give his attention to it; and if, understanding the facts, the Senate, or the Congress of the United States, reject this bill, I will confess myself more disappointed than I have been yet at any of their action.

The Senator from Virginia has not sought to show, as I understand him, that Congress did not possess the constitutional power to do this thing, although that is one of the most convenient arguments of the day; but his objection is put upon the ground that this man must stand where every other inventor stands, and reap his profit from the sale of his invention in the market. It was, sir, but the other day that we gave more money than is provided for in this bill to be distributed, according to the opinion of the Committee on Military Affairs, to persons who had made certain inventions in reference to percussion caps. There were two or three claimants to the invention; and we passed here, and without debate, a bill which paid money out of the Treasury of the United States to those gentlemen who were officers in the Army. Sir, I then thought, and I think now, that a pretty good argument might be got up upon the ground that a man who was in the employ of the United States, and was paid by the United States, owed his duties and all his time to the United States. That was suggested to the Senate, but a point was not made upon it.

Now, sir, here is a case in which a man has made an invention which, it is stated by the Commissioner, saves fourteen dollars a mile in the surveys of the public lands. I need not explain this to have every Senator understand it. Fourteen dollars is saved on every mile. It has been saved in Michigan, in Wisconsin, in Arkansas, in Ohio, and it will be saved throughout the State which you, sir, represent, [Mr. WELLER temporarily occupying the chair.] This is not a matter of opinion. It is a matter which has been demonstrated. We have the reports and statements of gentlemen who have tried it in the Lake Superior region. They not only state that the needle there will vary, but that it will absolutely point south, in consequence of the local attraction; and that without this invention, or something just like it, the surveys could not be made unless at a vast expense, and that if made at all, they would be made as you see the lines in the State of Arkansas, in the shape of an Indian bow.

Now, what is proposed by this bill? It is proposed to give the man who has made this invention, which is saving millions of dollars to the Government of the United States and its people, $15,000 for all the use of it that the Government has had, and for the use of it, undisputed, for all time to come. It is answered to this, that he has a patent. He has received only eighty dollars for patented instruments which he has sold; and why? Because the Government of the United States controls all surveys. If the Government would let out these surveys to individuals by contracting in all cases, when the contractors found they could not run the lines without Burt's solar compass being used, they would be obliged to pay his price, or not run the line. But we hold the monopoly of the surveys. And here is a man who saves millions of dollars to the Government by his invention. The Senator from Virginia well says, it is the strongest case that can be presented to Congress; and yet, if we follow the advice of that Senator, we are about to refuse to give him $15,000 for it.

Mr. President, I cannot consent, unless it is made necessary, to consume the time of the Senate in talking upon this question. But I do say, that if ever a case was presented where the Government was called upon to measure out, not justice, but a certain amount of justice, where an immense amount is due, to a citizen of the United States, this is that case. But I do not desire, nor do I design that this bill shall go through the Senate of the United States without consideration, and without the deliberate judgment of every Senator. I have stated the facts in the main briefly, very briefly indeed; but I do think that the facts themselves will so impress the subject upon the minds of Senators, that they cannot in justice, or with any proper sense of justice, refuse to grant a small pittance to an inventor who has thus saved millions of money to the Government of the United States.

Mr. SLIDELL. It is desirable to have an Executive session; I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the War Department, informing the House that he had transmitted therewith two hundred and fifty copies of the official Army Register of 1854, for the use of the members of the House of Representatives.

The communication was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is upon the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the bill granting a portion of the public lands to the State of Wisconsin, to aid in the construction of a certain railroad and branch railroad in said State. Upon that proposition the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] had obtained the floor.

Mr. DAWSON. Is it not in order to make a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order to do so if the gentleman had obtained the floor, but he cannot take the floor from the gentleman from Illinois during the morning hour.

Mr. EWING. Is it in order to rise to a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. That question is always in order, unless some other privileged motion shuts it out.

Mr. EWING. The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of George W. Isaacs and others, in reference to the proposed contest of the right of Hon. Mike Walsh to a seat upon this floor, have, in a meeting at which I was not present, but in the conclusions to which they came I fully agree, directed me to report back the memorial to the House, and ask leave to be discharged from its further consideration. The memorial, I may as well state, is unsupported and uncorroborated by any proof whatever, but is accompanied by a rather unusual proposition, and the unprecedented request, that a commission be sent to New York to take this proof. I ask leave that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the matter.

It was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question first in order is upon referring to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the bill granting a portion of the public lands to the State of Wisconsin, to aid in the construction of a railroad, and a branch railroad, in said State. Upon this motion the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] had obtained the floor.

Mr. BISSELL. In obtaining the floor I had no purpose to say anything more than to correct, very briefly, some of the errors into which the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] over the way, I thought, had fallen in the remarks which he made in opposition to the passage of the bill now before the House. I do not design to do anything more than that now. The principle of granting portions of the public domain for the purpose of aiding in the construction of public works, especially railroads, was, I thought, well settled in this House and the country. I say, I thought that the principle of these grants was well settled, and that the country, Congress, and the Executive, had become convinced of the correctness of that policy. Nor is it a recent policy at all. It is a policy which dates as far back as the birth of the oldest State which was formed out of the public domain. Not a State has been carved out of the public domain which has not received the benefit of this particular policy; not always in the precise form provided for in this bill, but substantially in the same mode. I thought, more especially since our experience of the last two or three years, that this policy might be regarded as the settled policy of the country. I was surprised to hear the gentleman from Tennessee, who is not now in his seat, I regret to see, allude to our experience connected with the Illinois Central railroad, and attempt to deduce from that arguments in opposition to this policy. My purpose, at the time I obtained the floor, was mainly to refer to the history of the Illinois Central railroad, for which a magnificent donation of land was made by Congress in proof and for the purpose of sustaining the correctness of the policy embraced in these bills.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] held in his argument, that the State of Illinois itself had been a great sufferer and loser in consequence of the action which had been had in reference to the grant made by Congress to that State for the Central railroad. There never was a greater mistake. I affirm here, and if I can stand upon my feet long enough I can prove, that not only the State of Illinois, but that the General Government and the settlers of Illinois, have all profited by that grant. What is true of that grant will be true of similar grants made for similar purposes.

The tract of country through which the Central railroad mainly runs, is in a portion of the State so remote from market, and so destitute of

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 32.

all communication with all other places, that, for thirty years, the time during which the lands had been in market, there had been no purchasers of these lands to be found, even at forty or fifty cents an acre. Settlers and emigrants avoided these lands upon this immense tract in the interior of the country. They passed by them for thirty years, and would not purchase them at $1 50 an acre, or even at forty or fifty cents, and thus this tract of land remained a desert waste. Congress granted two millions and a half acres of land to aid in the construction of that railroad, and now, in consequence of it, men are eager and anxious to purchase these very lands at $2 50 an acre. They esteem themselves fortunate in having the opportunity of purchasing these lands at $2 50 an acre; when, before the grant was made, they would not have taken them at $1 25 an acre, or at a lower price. They would not pay thirty cents an acre for them.

Does not this fact show at a glance where the benefit lies in this case? The land is better worth $2 50 an acre now, and the settler so regards it, than it was at thirty cents an acre before this grant was made by Congress. Is the settler, then, a sufferer by this grant? Does he lose by the operation? Not at all. If he had to pay $5 an acre he would get it cheaper; yes, cheaper than he would at fifty cents an acre if the grant had not been made.

But has the Government been a sufferer by the grant? Look at the late message of the President of the United States, in which he exults in the admirable working of this policy, and refers to this very road as an example of its working. Look at the report of the Secretary of the Interior, in confirmation of that message, in which he tells us that the Government has greatly profited by the adoption of this policy. If, then, we may take the statements of the President, and of those of the Secretary of the Interior—and I do not know who should better know the facts of its practical working—the Government, so far from being the loser from making these grants, is largely a gainer by this course of policy, in a pecuniary point of view. These gifts which accrue to the State, and not to companies, by the General Government, are returned, increased four fold. What then do gentlemen mean by talking about Government giving away its lands—about the Government giving away its resources—about the Government sacrificing the public property for the benefit of speculators and railroad companies? The settlers, as I have already said, are greatly benefited by the grant; not only those who have resided in the vicinity for some time, and the value of whose property is, of course, enhanced four fold, but those who wish to purchase now readily take up the land at $2 50 an acre when they would not have taken them at fifty cents an acre before the grant was made.

But the gentleman from Tennessee seemed to have considerable concern about the prosperity of the State of Illinois. He deeply lamented that the State had not taken different action with reference to it—such action as would have redounded more to its pecuniary advantage. Sir, I was very much astonished to find that a gentleman, who is usually so well informed upon all subjects connected with our action here, should have fallen into so grave and serious an error in reference to this matter. He estimates the cost of the road at $5,000,000. Why, sir, $17,000,000 is the lowest sum that has ever been fixed as the cost of the construction of this road.

A MEMBER. How long is it?

Mr. BISSELL. Seven hundred and four miles. Seventeen million dollars have been negotiated by the company, and a greater part of that sum has already been actually expended in the construction of the road. So that, so far from the entire cost of the road being $5,000,000, as the gentleman states, $17,000,000 have already been negotiated, a greater part of it in Europe, and brought by the company into the State of Illinois, and there expended. Now, I ask, under these circumstances, who is injured? Who are the parties that are injured? From whom is money taken? Not from the settler. There is no oppression upon him; he will tell you how much he is benefited by it. Not the State, for I hold in my hand the message of the executive of Illinois, delivered but a very few days ago to the Legislature of that State, in which he refers, exultingly, to the effects and consequences of the speedy construction of the Central railroad in Illinois. I take occasion to say that three pages of the pamphlet copy of that message are altogether occupied with notices of the most flattering kind of the state, progress, history, and effects of that road upon the interests of the State. The State, then, is satisfied; nay, more, she is delighted. The settler, also, is more than well pleased. The General Government announces, in its most solemn form, its entire satisfaction with the results of this policy. The company are left to take care of themselves; but they ought to, as I hope they will, remunerate themselves well for what they are doing. What have they done? This land was not given by Congress to them, but it was given by Congress to the State. The State had become deeply in debt, in consequence of attempting to build this very same road, among others, some sixteen years ago. Her credit was so depressed but a short time since that her bonds were only worth thirty-five cents in the market. Of course, therefore, she could not think of embarking in this great enterprise. She could not have raised money enough to have provided even for the survey of the road. What did she do? And it is that which the gentleman from Tennessee denounces her so much for. She knows well, by dear-bought experience, that these works are best made by private companies or individuals. Well, here was a company of gentlemen who came forward and said to the State, "We are railroad men; we have the means, or can raise them, to build the road, and although its length is seven hundred and four miles, yet we will undertake to build it, to put it in complete running order, and have it in operation in four years, upon certain conditions: transfer to us the lands, and in four years your railroad shall be finished and in operation, and in addition to that we will give you 7 per cent. of the gross proceeds (equal, of course, to 14 per cent. of the net proceeds) of the road for ever." I say equal, of course, to 14 per cent., because everybody knows that it costs 50 per cent. to operate a railroad. The State chartered the company, transferred these lands to trustees for their benefit, and they were to have them till the road was completed. Well, in this state of facts they set about to work; they negotiate $17,000,000; they spend their time, night and day, for four long years, and who should complain if, while benefiting everybody else, they themselves should reap some benefit from it? Why should that occasion indignation against the company? When these individuals have proposed, on fair and honorable terms, to construct this road for the State of Illinois, why denounce them as speculators, who are to make so much out of the country? I dare say they will make what they deserve to make, and no more. They deserve much for their enterprise, their energy, and their liberality. Our State feels it, and she is content with the bargain she has made with them. Why then should the gentleman from Tennessee complain on this account of the State of Illinois?

None of these grants have been made by Congress to monopolies; and, for aught I know, the grant to be made by the bill now under consideration to the State of Wisconsin, will be used by the State itself to build the road. I know of no company in connection with it. At any rate, the State will do as she thinks proper about it; and I take it that one of the sovereign States of this Union may be intrusted with her own affairs. Wisconsin may well be trusted to take care of her own affairs. But the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SKETCHER,] who spoke on the same side of this question with the gentleman from Tennessee, is greatly alarmed that if these things go on the new States will become the prey and victims of companies.

Mr. KERR. I will ask the gentleman a question. I understand that there is now a railroad running from Milwaukee to the Mississippi river. Now, I would ask the gentleman whether the proposed route of this railroad does not run exactly parallel with that road for a considerable distance? I learn likewise that the Milwaukee and Mississippi road was built by individual enterprise. I ask for information merely. Will not this scheme greatly conflict with the Milwaukee and Mississippi road?

Mr. BISSELL. My friend, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, will answer the gentleman.

Mr. DISNEY. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, I will reply to the interrogatory of the gentleman. There were two roads asked for by the people of Milwaukee—one running east and west to Prairie du Chien on the Mississippi, the other running northwestwardly from Milwaukee to La Crosse. The roads provided for in the pending bill run north and south. Of the two roads asked for by the people of Milwaukee, the one proposed to be run northwestwardly from that town to La Crosse was decided against by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CUTTING. If the chairman of the committee will permit me, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. In regard to the answer that has just been given, for my own information, I desire a little more particularity; and I will say that this particular bill in favor of the State of Wisconsin, which had for its apparent object the uniting of the great inland sea of Lake Superior with the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico, seemed to me to be a most important one; but I was yesterday waited upon by the president of the Milwaukee and Mississippi railroad, who informed me that the mayor of that city was here, and that he had called on the Senators from Wisconsin, and that one of them had admitted that he was in error in regard to the route which was proposed by this bill. A map was produced and exhibited to me, and by that map it seemed that as regards this portion of the bill, the branch railroad from Janesville by the way of Madison to the Mississippi river—that that branch railroad proposed to be built by means of the Government lands, for a distance of from forty to sixty miles, runs nearly parallel with and within an inconsiderable distance from this road that has been built by the great exertions of the people of that new State, against hope almost, and which is now nearly completed from Milwaukee to Madison, being one of the points through which this road runs.

Now, while I regret that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] should have been interrupted in the very interesting remarks which he was making when the question was propounded by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. KERR,] and partially answered by the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, yet it seemed to me that the answer was not specific enough, or at all satisfactory. For myself, I have this to say, that whenever the General Government take their funds, or take their public lands for the purpose of conferring them upon individuals or States, with the direct appropriation of them to a purpose antagonistic to, and clashing with individual enterprise, and destructive of that which individuals have done, with their private capital and their personal means, I, for one, will frown upon and oppose any such use of the Government patronage and Government means against the single-handed efforts of humble and comparatively powerless individuals; and more especially when they come from a new and thinly-settled country like that through which the Milwaukee road runs.

By looking at the map, in reference to the railroad from Milwaukee to Madison, it will be seen that the road contemplated by this bill is laid down upon the line, and along side of the former for a considerable distance. And you now propose to give to the State the right to the alternate sections of land lying fifteen miles on each side of it, where a railroad already runs, and the land may be taken from the very neighborhood of the existing railroad.

I submit to the friends of this bill that we ought to have a clear and explicit understanding about this matter. It would be unbecoming this body to legislate to the prejudice of the rights of individuals. If it be true that the branch road proposed to be built from Janesville, by way of Madison, to the St. Croix river, does run along side of this private road—for the building of which the inhabitants of that State are entitled to the greatest possible credit—it is essential, and due to the House, that the matter should be plainly understood. We are compelled, in a great degree, to act and vote upon faith. We rely upon the representations of honorable members from other portions of the country for what relates to their districts. We are strangers to them, and we ought, before being called upon to vote, and possibly to do injustice, particularly when intimations of injustice to individuals are made, to have the subject clearly explained. This bill ought not to be acted upon by conscientious men until an opportunity has been given to them to look into it themselves, and more especially so when the explanations which have been made are not satisfactory.

There is a map, in the committee room below, of the whole United States, upon which is traced the line of the Milwaukee road, and all that gentlemen have to do is to look at this map and see where these railroads laid down. It is now proposed to endow the State, in order that it, or its grantees, may become competitors, and that they may build a rival road, by means of donations of public lands. The land upon each side, even of the existing road, is given by this bill in order to accomplish it.

If these are the facts—and I profess to know nothing of this matter, except from information given to me by responsible gentlemen from that portion of the country—they ought to be known. I presume the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. DISNEY] will enlighten us, for we really want light upon this subject.

Mr. DISNEY. I will do so after the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] shall have finished his remarks.

Mr. BISSELL. Upon the subject to which the question of the gentleman from New York relates, I have not informed myself. I have not looked into the details of this bill, for I did not mean, after all, that the remarks I made should be particularly in favor of this bill, any more—though just as much—than in favor of any other bill now, or which may hereafter be, before us.

My object was to vindicate the policy of it, so far as our experience, connected with the history of the Illinois Central railroad was concerned, as that was the burden of the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] in opposition to this bill.

I suppose this, however, and I would say, in answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CUTTING], that this grant is so made to the State of Wisconsin. She has a great deal of legislation to enact before this goes into practical operation. I think that we may quite as safely leave the interests of her citizens in her own hands, as to take charge of those interests ourselves, whether those citizens comprise a railroad company or be individuals. That is all I have to say in reference to that branch of the subject.

When I was occupying the floor before, I think I did show that in the grant to the State of Illinois—so similar to the one now before us, that the one may be taken in all respects as the type of the other—that none of the parties interested had been injured, but that all had been benefited. I give the statements of the President of the United States, and of the Secretary of the Interior, without detaining the House by reading them, that the Treasury of the General Government is benefited by this policy. I give the statement formerly made by the Executive of the State of Illinois, that it has operated most beneficially upon that State, and of course upon her citizens. My own experience, and I believe the experience of others who have had any knowledge of this policy, is to the same effect, that the settlers are benefited by it. As for the company which is engaged to build this railroad, I apprehend gentlemen care very little about them; though I think, as I said before, they ought to make money. Seeing nothing, therefore, in the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee, and knowing nothing after five or six years reflection upon the subject, that inclines me to doubt the wisdom of this policy, I am in favor of all such bills; and in local matters which may affect particular States, I leave all those States to regulate and take care of themselves; as, for instance, that which was brought to view by the gentleman from New York. I think that matter is better in the hands of the Legislature of Wisconsin than here. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SKELTON] the other day seemed to manifest a great deal of anxiety lest the western States might become victims to monopolizing companies. There may be some danger of that, but I think the western States are shrewd enough to look to their own interests. At any rate, I do not hardly think it is becoming in a gentleman from New Jersey to lecture the western States upon the subject of monopolies, yielding up sovereignty, and all that sort of thing, to railroad or canal companies.

Mr. SKELTON. I hope the gentleman will allow me to say a very few words upon this point.

Mr. BISSELL. I cannot yield to the gentleman. I shall finish what I have to say in a few moments. I have merely to remark again, that I think it is hardly the part of a representative from the State of New Jersey to give us lectures or lessons upon that subject. Why, is the State of New Jersey itself anything except a railroad company? Is not the legislation of the State in the hands of one or two railroad companies? I believe her entire sovereignty is in the keeping of a railroad company, or the president thereof. [Laughter.] Indeed, I am not certain but the broad seal of the State has been handed over to some of these companies, and is now in the possession of these same companies. I do not know that it is so, but I think the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company would like to be in possession of it, at any rate. However, I received the admonitions of the gentleman from New Jersey with a great deal of good will, and I really hope my State will profit by it.

Mr. DISNEY obtained the floor.

Mr. SKELTON. I would like to say a few words in reference to the imputations that have been cast upon the State which I have the honor in part to represent. Indeed, sir, I presume I may claim the right as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no such right as a matter of privilege.

Mr. DISNEY. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from New Jersey, but I wish him to understand that I do so only for a very few moments.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY], having once spoken upon this bill, is not entitled to the floor to speak upon it again until all those who wish have spoken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has not had the floor upon the proposition to commit.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman made a speech upon the bill, at any rate.

The SPEAKER. But not upon the motion to commit.

Mr. SKELTON. I have but very few words to say upon this subject. If it had not been that the reputation of my State has been assailed upon this floor, I should not have risen to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois. But I consider it the duty of a member, representing a State of the character which the State of New Jersey possesses in this Union, to allow no imputation to be thrown upon her.

We in New Jersey have always been strongly in favor of State rights. We have, in looking back upon our past history, shown to the American people and to the world that we are capable of self-government.

The time was when our number of inhabitants was very small, that the whole power of the British Government took possession of our territory, but the people of New Jersey even then never yielded for a moment, but fought bravely for their rights; and they eventually succeeded in driving from their soil, after the most bloody and sanguinary battles of the Revolution, the most desperate enemy that this country has ever known. It would not be becoming the representatives of New Jersey at this time to allow the other States of this Union to undertake to dictate to them on questions of domestic policy, nor yet to cast aspersions upon them.

With regard to these railroad companies, and chartered companies generally throughout the United States, I am not the defender of them. I wish it to be distinctly understood that what I have to say is not in defense of chartered corporations anywhere, but in defense of the fair fame, independence, and liberties of the people of a sovereign State.

Sir, I could show this House, if my time allowed—but I do not propose to trespass on the courtesy tendered me by the gentleman from Ohio—that the people of New Jersey not only have the power of self-government, but that they have the capability; and not only that, but that they have always been careful to respect and protect the rights and interests of the people of the other States of the Union.

Now, I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois, and to all other gentlemen who may rise upon this floor, and make reflections upon the State of New Jersey, that we are a sovereign State, and that we have the right, the capability, and the determination to govern ourselves, and our own local institutions in our own way—

Mr. COBB, (interrupting.) I hope that the gentleman from New Jersey will not enter into a discussion of the question of State rights, for if we once get upon that question we shall never do any business during this Congress. We all know that New Jersey is capable of taking care of herself, and she sends sons here who are more than capable of taking care of her interests.

The SPEAKER. It is competent for a gentleman holding the floor to yield it to another for explanation only, and if objection is made, the Chair must decide that the gentleman from New Jersey is indulging in remarks which are not in order.

Mr. SKELTON. Do I understand the Chair to decide that my remarks are not in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that it is competent to the gentleman from Ohio, having the floor, to yield it to the gentleman from New Jersey for explanation only.

Mr. SKELTON. That is what I am attempting to do. I am explaining my course in debating this question, and defending the reputation of my State.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must endeavor to draw a distinction between mere explanation and a speech, and if any member calls the attention of the Chair to it the Chair must rule the remarks of the gentleman out of order.

Mr. COBB. I am always very much interested in the speeches of the gentleman from New Jersey, but I desire to facilitate the business of the House.

Mr. SKELTON. Well, I will take my seat now.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama call the gentleman from New Jersey to order?

Mr. COBB. I hate to do it, and I hope he will quit without being called to order.

The SPEAKER. If not objected to by any member, the gentleman from New Jersey can proceed with his remarks.

Mr. DISNEY. With every disposition to extend to the gentleman from New Jersey all the courtesy which the proprieties of the case will admit of, still I confess that I feel unwilling to yield the floor to him to make any very extended remarks.

Mr. SKELTON. I will not trespass on the courtesy of the gentleman and of the House, but will reserve my remarks for some other occasion.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I presume that my friend and colleague [Mr. DISNEY] is about to make the closing speech on this bill.

Mr. DISNEY. Oh, no.

Mr. TAYLOR. I desire to make a few remarks about it, and I should like to do so now, if it be agreeable to my colleague. He will have the privilege to close the debate, and it may be that unless the opportunity be afforded me now, I shall not have it at all.

Mr. DISNEY. My whole purpose and object has been to afford to every gentleman upon this floor ample opportunity to examine all the provisions of the bill, and to do it in every possible position in which the case might be considered. The bill has met with my deliberate approval and judgment, after a calm and dispassionate examination; and, confident in the justice and validity of my conclusion, I shall not avoid or shrink from any examination, no matter from what quarter it may come. And, sir, at least in all matters of this sort there are but one or two questions which require investigation or consideration.

My purpose in rising here was rather more to make one or two statements of facts than to go into any general or extended argument in regard to the provisions of the bill, or its operation; but being up, it occurs to me that it might be well that I should say a word or two in relation to some questions connected with it generally, as not belonging to this bill merely but to kindred bills.

And let me first advise the House, that since this question was last before it, I have found that I was inadvertently led into an error in regard to the quantity of land involved in this grant. I have, however, since the time which has elapsed, had the draughtsman of the Committee on Public Lands to give me his regular official statement. From that I find that I have overstated the quantity of land which is proposed to be granted. I have heard out of doors, as I suppose every member of this committee has, all sorts of stories in reference to these pending railroads. I have heard, to a greater or less extent, the same kind of stories in regard to almost every railroad bill pending before Congress. I had heard that the amount of land involved in the grant, instead of being 2,500,000, was 3,700,000 acres. Now, let me say to the House, that in making up these statements, the course of the Committee on Public Lands has been this: Before they have reported a bill to the House they require their draughtsman, from an examination of a map of the public lands, to make an estimate of the quantity of the land to be embraced in the grant. In this case, as I have already stated, I inadvertently took up the wrong statement. I have now, however, the statement made by the draughtsman before me. It appears that the amount involved in the bill, instead of being 2,500,000 acres, is only 1,692,320 acres. I am asked, "What is the length of the road?" and I advert to the question, because it is put in reference to the ascertaining of the quantity of land.

Now the gentleman will here bear in mind that in these bills the grant is limited to the selection of lands within a range of fifteen miles on either side of the proposed road, and if the General Government has disposed of, or in any manner alienated the land within that limit, the road gets none. Consequently, to make up the calculation, a calm examination is to be made of all the public land lying within fifteen miles of the proposed road. These estimates are made from the maps, which show all the locations, and the particular subdivisions, of the public domain, within the bounds of the indicated route.

I repeat it, the quantity of land proposed to be granted in this bill, as embraced in both routes, is 1,692,320 acres; and that that quantity, in connection with that which will be granted to another road, which the Committee on Public Lands have determined to report favorably upon to the House—the Prairie du Chien road—will not make the grant for railroad purposes to the State of Wisconsin exceed the amount to which she will be entitled, taking the grant to Illinois as the unit of comparison. So much for the equity of the matter.

Let me now advert to the matter which was presented by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CUTTING.] He finds a difficulty in his way, in the fact that a railroad is started from Milwaukee, running for part of the distance, as he supposes, nearly parallel to the road provided for in the bill; and he thinks it a hardship and an impropriety for the Government to come forward and give its aid to one road to the injury of another. Now, let me say, in the first place, both these routes are individual and private enterprises.

Mr. CUTTING. Both which routes?
Mr. DISNEY. All of them. The State of Wisconsin, speaking through its State Legislature, which, we are bound to presume, is amply competent to decide what routes are important to the interests of that State, have indicated, not the route spoken of by the gentleman from New York, but the route indicated by the pending bill. I repeat it, that the Legislature of Wisconsin have asked Congress to aid the construction of the roads provided for in the pending bill, while they have not asked aid in favor of the road of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. CUTTING. I would ask the gentleman why the Legislature of Wisconsin should ask for public lands, if a road is constructed, or nearly finished, to Madison, by private enterprise; or so nearly completed that it is entirely graded to Madison, and in relation to which nothing is left to be done but to put down the rails—what, I say, could the Legislature ask for a road of that description?

Mr. DISNEY. I understand the gentleman complains of the competition of the roads south and east of Madison. Let me say to the gentleman, that as far as the pending bill is concerned the company gets no land south of Madison. There is not, in my bill, any aid proposed to be given by the General Government to the company mentioned in the bill, by a grant of lands south of the town of Madison, because there are no public lands there.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. DISNEY. I dislike to be interrupted.

Mr. WENTWORTH. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CUTTING] made an issue upon this floor in reference to this matter. The gentleman representing the Milwaukee district [Mr. WELLS] is now in the House, and is prepared, or ought to be prepared, to speak for that place, and I hope the gentleman from Ohio will allow that gentleman to rise in his place and speak for Milwaukee.

Mr. DISNEY. I was about to proceed and state—

Mr. WENTWORTH, (interrupting.) I shall go for this bill if the gentleman from Milwaukee is for it, and I want him to speak, and let the House know his views upon this subject.

Mr. DISNEY. I have said that the Legislature of Wisconsin, familiar as of necessity they must be with the value and the condition of the respective roads within her limits, have selected and indicated the roads provided for in this bill as the most important to that State; and this fact ought to be conclusive with this House in regard to their action upon it.

Mr. PECKHAM. How?

Mr. DISNEY. By a memorial addressed to Congress.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow the representative from Milwaukee to state his views?

Mr. DISNEY. I will soon.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I wish to know if this bill is the united wish of the inhabitants of Milwaukee? If so, I shall vote for it, and I hope the gentleman from Ohio will give that gentleman an opportunity to speak.

Mr. DISNEY. I will allow the gentleman a brief statement.

Mr. WELLS. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] has called upon me to say whether I acquiesce in this measure. I would reply that I have been opposed to it. I opposed it before the committee. I have no hesitation in saying that it is generally considered as unfavorable to the Milwaukee and Lake Shore interests. The bill having passed the Senate came to the House. The majority of the committee were in favor of it. The rest of the delegation from Wisconsin were known to advocate its passage; and I had concluded not to make open opposition to it on this floor, with the understanding that my colleague would also remain silent, and that we should leave the House to pass upon its merits, after both sides had been fairly presented by those not immediately interested. I have adopted this course, too, in the hope that it would secure a favorable consideration to other bills, which would directly benefit the interests which I more immediately represent.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether he intends to vote for the bill now under consideration?

Mr. WELLS. I have some question about it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, desired to obtain the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio cannot yield to more than one gentleman at a time.

Mr. SMITH. I yield, of course, to the gentleman from Wisconsin, over the way, to answer the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] is entitled to the floor; but yielded to the gentleman from Wisconsin for the purpose of explanation. The Chair therefore could not, of course, award the floor to a third person.

Mr. WELLS. I suppose I have the right to answer affirmatively or negatively, or neither. In the present condition of things, I prefer not to answer at all, but to wait the further action of the House.

Mr. COBB. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will say one way or the other, whether he will vote for the bill or not?

Mr. WELLS. I have nothing further to say upon the subject for the present.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin, then, refuse to answer the question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois must remember that the gentleman from Ohio is upon the floor, and has only yielded to the gentleman from Wisconsin for the purpose of explanation.

Mr. DISNEY. I have stated one fact, which, if duly reflected upon, must be conclusive with every gentleman of the committee with regard to the difficulty, which has been raised.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that they had passed Senate bills of the following titles, in which he was instructed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 40) making a grant of land to the State of Arkansas, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State.

An act (No. 74) making a grant of land to the State of California, to aid in the construction of railroads from San Francisco to San José; Benicia to Marysville; Sacramento City, via Auburn, to Nevada City, and Stockton to Sonora.

An act (No. 98) making a grant of land to the State of Florida, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State.

An act (No. 110) granting the State of Wisconsin land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Madison to the Mississippi river.

An act (No. 173) making a grant of land to the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said States.

An act (No. 204) granting to the State of Alabama public lands in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of the Alabama and Tennessee railroad, from Selma, on the Alabama river, to the Tennessee river, at or near Gunter's Landing; and also the Memphis and Charleston railroad, from Memphis, on the Mississippi river, to some point connecting with the Nashville, Chattanooga, and Charleston railroad.

An act (No. 205) making a grant of land to the State of Alabama, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the line of Georgia, on the Chattahoochee river, to the city of Mobile.]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio, if he will allow me, whether there are any other bills before the Committee on Public Lands to aid in the construction of railroads in the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. DISNEY. The committee, as I have already stated, have reported another bill, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Madison, in Wisconsin, westward to Prairie du Chien, and that seems to be the understanding of the committee to be the share that State is entitled to. The committee have endeavored to apportion these grants among the different States in which the public lands are located, so as to place them all upon an equality with the State of Illinois, and I apprehend that remark covers the information which the gentleman from Virginia desires.

Mr. SMITH. I apprehend not.

Mr. DISNEY. Then I do not understand the point the gentleman would make.

Mr. SMITH. The point I refer to is this: I want to understand how many propositions to appropriate land for the benefit of Wisconsin are before the Committee on Public Lands? We have been told that there are one hundred and seventy in all before that committee; I want to know how many are for the benefit of Wisconsin?

Mr. DISNEY. It matters not whether there are one or five hundred.

Mr. SMITH. But will the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. DISNEY. I have said that the committee have reported one bill which is now before the House, and that they have agreed to report another. That is all they have agreed to recommend to the House for the benefit of Wisconsin. They have reported adversely upon other propositions for the benefit of that State. But I repeat, that it has been the policy of the committee to equalize, as much as possible, these grants of land among the different States which are to receive them; and whether there are one or five hundred propositions before our committee makes no difference so long as an undue proportion is not given to any one State.

But to proceed. I said a moment ago, that there are no public lands south and east of the town of Madison, in the State of Wisconsin, and hence the competition of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUTTINE] speaks cannot be urged as an objection to the practical operation of this bill. I say there is no part of the public domain which will be donated by the bill now pending before the House, and cannot, therefore, be located upon to the detriment of any other road. This fact is a sufficient reply to all the difficulties raised by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire if the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. JONES. Then, with a view of getting into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and progressing with the homestead bill, I move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table. I do not think we shall suffer much by postponing this question.

Mr. DISNEY. I should like very much to finish what I have to say now.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is not debatable; the gentleman from Tennessee has a right to submit his motion.

The question was then put on Mr. Jones's motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope my friend from Tennessee will first permit me to make a motion connected with the business that is to come up next week. I desire to have certain bills on the Speaker's table taken up and referred to the Committee on Territories, so that they may be acted on there, and be reported back in time for the action of the House next week.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. To what bills does the gentleman from Illinois refer?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The territorial bills on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. If not objected to, the territorial bills on the Speaker's table will be taken up and referred.

Many MEMBERS. What bills are they?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There are several bills. I do not know what they are, but they relate to territorial affairs.

[Loud cries of "What are they?"]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Gentlemen need not be uneasy; the Nebraska bill is not one of them.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It has not passed the Senate yet.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And it will probably be some time before it does.

Mr. HENN. I hope all the bills on the Speaker's table will be taken up and referred.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I trust that course will be pursued.

Mr. JONES. If any bill gives rise to debate I shall insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. If the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is withdrawn, the business on the Speaker's table is now in order.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw it for the present.

The following bills were then taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by their respective titles, and severally referred, as indicated below:

An act to aid the Territory of Minnesota in constructing a railroad for military, postal, and other purposes. Referred to the Committee on Territories.

An act making a grant of lands to the State of Louisiana, to aid in the construction of a certain railroad in that State. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act making a grant of land, in the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Oakland and Ottawa railroad, and a railroad from the Grand Rapids to the Straits of Mackinaw, and a railroad from Pontiac, via Pere Marquette river, Manitowoc, and Ontonagon river, to Kewana Point, with a branch to the vicinity of Carp river, upon Lake Superior. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act making further appropriation for the improvement of Cape Fear river, North Carolina. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act to authorize the State of Illinois to select the residue of the lands to which she is entitled under the act of March 2, 1827, granting land to aid that State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Illinois river with those of Lake Michigan. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st of July, 1801. Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

An act to grant to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated public lands remaining unsold in that State. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act to establish a land district in the State of Florida, to be called the district of Tampa. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act to relinquish certain lands to the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act to constitute Palatka and Bayport, in the State of Florida, ports of delivery respectively. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act constituting San Pedro, in the State of California, a port of entry and delivery. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act making Brunswick, in the State of Georgia, a port of entry, and for other purposes. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act appointing commissioners to ascertain certain facts relative to private land claims in the Territory of Michigan. Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

S. 228. An act for the relief of settlers on lands reserved for railroad purposes. Read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the last bill read may be now taken up and put upon its passage. It is a bill the merits of which can be understood in a very few moments. It has passed the Senate. The bill was read through.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The motion to go into the Committee of the Whole was withdrawn with the understanding that no bill was to give rise to debate, but that they should be merely taken up, read, and referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. WARREN. Then I shall not press my motion.

Mr. JONES. I hope this bill will go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ORR. I move that it be so referred.

The motion was agreed to.

The following resolution and bills were then read a first and second time, by their respective titles, and referred, as indicated below:

A resolution accepting certain volumes and medals presented by her Britannic Majesty's Government to the United States. Referred to the Committee on the Library.

An act for the relief of Ira Day, of Vermont. Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

An act making a grant of land to the State of Louisiana, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act making a grant of land to the State of Arkansas, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act making a grant of land to the State of California, to aid in the construction of railroads from San Francisco to San José, Benicia, to Marysville, Sacramento City, via Auburn, to Nevada

City and Stockton, to Sonora. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act making a grant of land to the State of Florida, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in that State. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act granting to the State of Wisconsin land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Madison to the Mississippi river. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act making a grant of land to the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said States. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act granting to the State of Alabama public lands, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of the Alabama and Tennessee railroad, from Selma, on the Alabama river to the Tennessee river, at or near Gunter's Landing; and, also, the Memphis and Charleston railroad, from Memphis, on the Mississippi, to some point connecting the Nashville, Chattanooga, and Charleston railroad; referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act making a grant of land to the State of Alabama, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the line of Georgia, on the Chattahoochee river, to the city of Mobile, in Alabama; referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ORR in the chair.)

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, they had under consideration House bill (No. 37) reported from the Committee on Agriculture by Mr. DAWSON, "to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same during the period herein specified." General debate having closed by order of the House, the committee will now proceed to consider the bill by sections. The Clerk will report the first section of the bill.

The first section of the bill was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That any person who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, free of cost, one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public lands, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, and after the same shall have been surveyed."

Mr. COBB. I desire to offer an amendment to the section just read. Before I offer it, I wish to say, if, after a thorough consideration of this bill, it should not be so perfected as to meet my approbation, that I intend to offer the substitute of which I gave notice some little time ago, and which has already been printed. The amendment which I now propose to offer to the first section, is to strike out all after the word "any," in the third line, and insert the following:

—free white person, the head of a family and citizen of the United States, or any single free white male person of the age of twenty-one and upwards, a citizen of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, free of cost, one hundred and sixty acres, titled to enter, free of cost, one hundred and sixty acres, subject to private entry at $1 25 per acre, either in the States or Territories, of any vacant surveyed agricultural lands not reserved or appropriated, and which shall not interfere with any existing rights, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands.

The committee will find, upon comparing the amendment I propose with the first section, that there are several material differences. In the first place, it proposes to grant one hundred and sixty acres of land to a single man who may have arrived at the age of twenty-one, and who may choose to make a location upon the public lands, the same as is proposed by this bill to be given to head of families. I consider this an important amendment.

The amendment proposes, in the second place, that no lands shall be located upon, except agricultural lands, and those too which may be subject to private entry at $1 25 an acre. The necessity of this amendment must strike every member of the House instantly. I do not desire, in the first place, that when we have given a man the right to a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, to allow him to go and locate it upon the mineral lands.

After consultation with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, I am satisfied that, as the bill now reads, any man would be entitled to go and locate his land upon the mineral lands of the United States; and I have therefore proposed to amend so as to confine the bill in its operations to the mineral lands.

The next important provision in the amendment provides that the warrants shall be located upon lands subject to private entry at $1 25 an acre. This is to avoid the locations being made upon the alternate sections upon which we have raised the price to $2 50 an acre, the object of which was, that in making donations to the States for railroad purposes, the Government should at least be compensated to some extent for the land they have given away.

These are the prominent features of the amendment to which I desire to call the attention of the committee. Gentlemen will see that they are material, and that they differ materially from the original provisions of the bill. It proposes to extend the privileges of the bill to single men, as well as to require them to locate upon agricultural lands, subject to private entry, at the price of $1 25 an acre, so that they shall not locate upon the lands upon which the price has been raised to $2 50 an acre, and upon mineral lands. These are important features. I think they will strike every member of the committee as such, and I am satisfied, from several consultations I have had with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, [Mr. Dawson,] that he cannot interpose any very serious objections to the adoption of the amendment.

I do not know that I need to say more at present in support of my amendment. I am aware that it will operate to increase the extent of the provisions of the bill, but I hope it will be adopted. I did hope that my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] who is a bachelor, would have brought forward an amendment proposing to extend the privileges of the bill to unmarried females who shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years. I advocated that policy in committee, but I was overruled. I hope, however, that my bachelor friend from the State of Tennessee, if he will not entitle himself to enjoy the privileges of the bill by sharing them with a female, will at least allow her to take to herself the farm and enjoy it in loneliness.

Mr. DAWSON. I think it will be the best policy for the friends of the bill to adhere to it as reported, and pass it in its original form. There are, it is true, some arguments to be adduced in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, but I think that, upon examination, it will be found that it contains so many propositions in a single sentence that its interpretation will be rendered very ambiguous, if adopted by the committee.

It proposes to amend, in the third line of the section, by extending the privileges of the bill to single as well as married men. Now, I do not object to that proposition, and would agree at once to its adoption, but I fear that it may possibly endanger the passage of the bill. It will be bad policy for us to propose to do too much at once. I prefer, the more certainly to secure the passage of the bill, to confine its operation, in the first instance, to the heads of families.

The last part of the gentleman's amendment is out of place. He wishes to confine the entries to lands, the minimum value of which is only $1 25 an acre, thereby intending to exclude the alternate sections reserved in the various railroad grants that have been made by Congress. If the committee see proper to adopt it, I have no objection to it, but it is ill-timed and out of place. If introduced at all, it would come in properly in the seventeenth line of the last section. I would, therefore, suggest to the gentleman from Alabama, that he should divide his amendment, and offer it separately. Some of the propositions contained in it I shall not object to; but I trust that the friends of the bill will adhere to it in its present shape, and endeavor to carry it through without any material alterations.

Mr. DEAN. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama by striking out the word "State."

Mr. TAYLOR. How will it read then?

Mr. DEAN. It will read "in any territory of the United States."

I am in favor of the bill as reported by the Committee on Agriculture, or of the principles of that bill; and I shall vote for it in almost any form, as long as it contains the principle of granting one hundred and sixty acres of land to actual settlers free of cost. I desire to perfect it; but I hope that a bill to carry out that principle will be passed before the adjournment of the present Congress.

Gentlemen who have made hour speeches upon this subject have said that the Senate will not pass the bill. Now I submit to gentlemen who are in favor of this principle, that if we cannot get the whole, if we cannot provide a homestead for every actual settler in the States, we can at least incorporate the principle into the territorial bills, and insist that it shall be a fundamental law hereafter in the organization of new Territories.

Mr. DAWSON. What gentleman who has made an hour speech has said that the Senate will not pass the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind the gentleman from New York that he will hold that debate must be strictly confined to the amendments under consideration. The gentleman must therefore confine his remarks to the proposition to strike out "State."

Mr. DEAN. I am confining my remarks to the proposition to confine the operation of this bill to the Territories. In the States rights have already accrued and become vested in individuals. The Government can sell the lands in the States, but if individuals choose to go into the Territories, there can be no doubt that they ought to have a farm given them in return for the privation that they must there endure.

Sir, this question in regard to the public lands ought to be taken out of Congress. The lands within the States ought to be ceded to those States, and they should be allowed to administer their own lands as suits themselves. There is a bill pending here for that purpose so far as one of the States is concerned. But we have exclusive jurisdiction over the Territories, and we ought to exercise it, and see that this principle is carried out in the Territories, although we may not be able to secure it in the States. It is for that reason that I propose to strike out the word "State" in the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

There is another reason why this ought to be done. The public lands were originally ceded by New York, Virginia, and other States, for the purpose of having them settled and formed into republican States; and when those republican States are formed, the jurisdiction over the lands ought to be granted to them; but, so far as the Territories are concerned, I insist that it is the duty of every friend of the homestead policy to see that this principle is carried out strictly, and applied to every Territory hereafter to be formed.

Mr. COBB. Believing the gentleman's amendment wrong, I, of course, oppose it. In the first place, I hold that the lands within the States belonging to the Federal Government should be governed, so far as settlements are concerned, by precisely the same law that they are in the Territories; but I shall bring forward no argument to refute the gentleman's position; I shall not attempt to do it; I think it is so obvious that it is hardly necessary for me to allude to it.

But one word to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, [Mr. Dawson,] who reported the first bill here, though not the first one introduced into the House, or of which notice was given of its introduction; but bill No. 37, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and next day reported back without almost an hour's consideration. The amendment which I propose is one that was thoroughly matured by the Committee on Public Lands, after due deliberation, for nearly one month. Can the gentleman, or does he, point out one solitary provision in my amendment to which he objects? If he can or does I will pause for him to point it out. Then he does not object to one single provision of my amendment; but he says that it comes in ill time, and therefore proposes to add it along by piecemeal to perfect his own bill. I am for perfecting a bill when I commence with its consideration. If it be perfected before it reaches the point where the gentleman's bill may be perfect, why then we can easily dispose of such parts of his bill as we deem wholly and entirely imperfect.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman that he must apply the same rule to him as he did to the gentleman from New York. The gentleman must confine his remarks to opposing the amendment to strike out the word "States."

Mr. COBB. That is confining me within too prescribed a field. I want more sea room. [Laughter.]

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The first section of the bill, as it stands now, is near about right. I move, for the purpose of perfecting it in my estimation, a slight amendment. Insert after "family" the words "or who is eighteen years of age," so that the section will read:

"That any person who is the head of a family, or who is eighteen years of age, and a citizen of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, free of cost, one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public lands, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, and after the same shall have been surveyed."

Gentlemen suggest that I insert twenty-one instead of eighteen. I prefer the age of eighteen, because that is the age at which your Government require military services of the male citizens of the country. When they are thought competent and able to perform such service I think that it is nothing but right that they should be participants in the benefits of a bill of this kind.

Again, in another part of the bill, it is proposed that if the person who settles on the land shall die before the expiration of the five years, that then the right of location shall be sold for the benefit of the heirs who are fourteen years of age. When we come to that part of the bill I will—

Mr. COBB, (interrupting.) I rise to a question of order. I proposed an amendment to the original bill, and I hold it is not proper for the gentleman to offer an amendment, and speak to it, while my motion is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, and rules that it is in order to offer an amendment to the portion of the bill proposed to be stricken out, in order to perfect it, before the vote is taken upon the motion to strike out.

Mr. JONES. When we shall come to that clause of the bill which provides that its benefits shall result to children under fourteen years of age, I will move to strike out "fourteen" and insert, in lieu thereof, "eighteen," so that there shall be no gap left in this provision; and that, at the time the benefits shall cease to the children, they shall acquire it in their own right.

Again, there are many persons in this country who marry at as early an age as eighteen; and there are many who, at that age, might desire to go and make a location of land preparatory to forming that union. I would desire this bill to be so perfect, that if such persons should make the location at eighteen years of age, and then after that continue to cultivate the land for five years, they shall have all the rights secured by this bill. I can see no good reason why it should not be so. With that amendment, the section will be about as perfect, in my estimation, as it can be made. It will be plain, simple, and comprehensive.

The other provisions in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, or some of them, if it be deemed right by the committee to incorporate them, will come in in other parts of the bill more appropriately than in this section.

I hope the committee will adopt this amendment, and thereby provide that American citizens, heads of families, or eighteen years of age, shall be embraced within the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Would an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama be now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is pending, and is first to be acted upon. An amendment will then be in order.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I could not hear what the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee was.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill entitled "An act for the relief of the purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands," in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House; and then he withdrew.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. GREENWOOD,] that he will have an opportunity to offer his amendment when the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama again comes up. The question now is upon the motion proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. READY. I would suggest to my colleague [Mr. JONES] that he will not effect the object which he has in view by the amendment he has proposed. I approve the principle at which he is aiming. If he had proposed to insert the words "twenty-one years," instead of "eighteen," I should have given him my hearty support. The reason why I think twenty-one is a more suitable age than eighteen, is found in part in a subsequent provision of this bill. It is provided, that those who propose to avail themselves of the benefit of this homestead privilege shall not be permitted to do so unless they can prove that they continuously reside upon their one hundred and sixty acres of land for five years. If you extend the provision to minors, will you not be engaged in a useless work? Minors are under the control of their parents; and, indeed, they may be said to be servants. Parents have the right to command the time and services of their children until they have arrived at their majority. Some gentlemen here say that it is not always so. Perhaps that may be true, but the cases are always rare; and unless the individual whom you propose to benefit by this law is entitled to the control of his own time and his actions, I think that there would be no use in declaring that he should be so entitled. I think, perhaps, that it would be endangering the bill to insert a useless provision of this kind; but if you provide that the head of a family, who is of the age of twenty-one years, shall have the right to make an entry upon the public land, provided that he will settle upon it and continue to reside upon it for five years, you then insert a provision which can be carried out, and the object of my colleague may be attained.

The question was then taken upon Mr. JONES's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. YATES. I now propose the following amendment: To strike out the words in the third line, "or who is the head of a family."

Mr. CHAIRMAN, the short time allowed by the rules of the House will not allow me to enter into the discussion of the merits of this bill. I am glad, however, that there is time enough for me to say that it meets with my full approbation. Two years ago, when the bill was pending before Congress, I had the good fortune to express my views at some length in its favor, and since that time I have had no reason to change my opinions. In fact, more mature reflection, and the interchange of views with my constituents, have served to confirm me in my convictions, and I am now satisfied that the proposed measure ought at once to be adopted by Congress.

The friends of the homestead bill in the last Congress labored hard for its passage; and so convincing were the arguments in its favor, that on the 12th day of May, 1852, it passed the House of Representatives by a vote of more than two to one. It went to the Senate, and from the opposition or indifference of that body, or for the want of time, it failed to pass. The passage of the bill through the House met the sanction of the country. It has been indorsed and commended to Congress by various State Legislatures. I well recollect, sir—and it is a pleasant recollection—that upon my return home at the close of the first session of the last Congress, I was taken by the hand by many a laboring man and greeted with warm benedictions because of the very humble part I had taken in favor of the measure. And when I told them, what I then believed, that it failed in the Senate for want of time, but that I had no doubt it would pass that body at its short session, they were inspired with new hope. The mere prospect of its passage gladdened the heart and brightened the eye of many a poor and homeless man, who had been led to look anxiously for a home on the public domain, and who could not understand why the Government should, with the grasp of the miser, hold on to her lands unoccupied and unimproved, while he had no home on earth, but had a willing heart and hand to bring them into settlement and cultivation.

But the action of the Senate only brought renewed disappointment. The visions of a home, with all its sweet and hallowed associations of fire-side, wife, children, and friends, vanished before the opposition or inaction of the Senate. But these hopes are now again revived, and I trust they will not be again disappointed. At all events, we can do our duty, and leave the responsibility of its defeat, if it is to be defeated, where it properly belongs.

It would be easy to show that the General Government would profit greatly by these grants to the actual settler; that it would greatly increase the value of the remaining unoccupied lands, and augment, to a great extent, the aggregate of national production and prosperity. It would be easy to show that it would promote immigration to the land States, and insure their settlement and improvement; and that it would establish in comfortable homes, and elevate in character, a large portion of our laboring classes, who now gain a scanty livelihood by the hard earnings of daily toil, or who, as mere tenants of the soil, hopelessly struggle against adverse fortune without the prospect of bettering their condition. But there is not time to take up these points. The small quantity of the public lands to be taken would not be missed by the Government. It is not to be supposed that more than half a million of persons would avail themselves of the provisions of this bill. And what would a half million, out of the ten million quarter sections of land, be to the Government?

Mr. CHAIRMAN, that we may form some idea of the vast domain upon which American agriculture is to achieve its triumphs, I remark, that since the year 1802, thirteen new States (Ohio being the first and California the last) have been admitted into the Union, embracing an area of five hundred and six million acres of land. That vast country stretching from the northern lakes and the Mississippi river to the borders of California and the Pacific ocean, embraces an additional area of eleven hundred and ten million acres. There were of unsold and unappropriated, offered and unoffered lands, up to June 30, 1853, in the thirteen States and Territories, over thirteen hundred and sixty million acres apportioned in the said States and Territories, as designated in the following table:

States and Territories.	Area of Acres.
Ohio.....	244,196.08
Indiana.....	247,339.41
Illinois.....	4,115,969.97

Thus we see how mighty is the course on which is to be run the great race of American labor. Our public domain stretches far into the West, over mighty forests and prairies, crossing mountains and rivers, on to the Pacific ocean. Here, sir, is a domain boundless, and exhaustless for generations to come, to be applied to the great purposes of national advancement, internal improvement, and education, and to be the homes of our spreading millions of American freemen. Thank God! here is room for every son of toil. We can say to every poor laboring man, "Here is room." And I hope the day is now at hand, when these public lands shall be opened for occupation in limited quantities to the actual settler, and when every homeless and houseless American citizen, and every poor wanderer from foreign oppression, may find upon this broad domain a home for himself and his posterity forever.

I am no agrarian, sir. I can well see why absolute fee-simple title in the soil is not only right, but necessary to insure permanent improvements, such as houses, farms, &c., essential to the comfort of families and the prosperity of the State. But I also believe that no law or conventional usage, nothing, except a man's own want of energy or his worthlessness, should exclude him from a sufficiency of the earth to be tilled for the subsistence of himself and family. Shall he breathe the free air of Heaven, drink the pure water so bountifully provided, and enjoy the light of God's glorious sun, without money and without price, and yet, of all the untold million acres of this green earth, not have a spot for the labor of his hands and the home of his heart?

The measure is not agrarian. It does not take your property and give it to me. It gives to each person a portion of his own interest, or share in this great heritage held by the Government in trust for all. And if these lands were divided among the people, the share of each would be far more than that which is allowed by this bill. I repeat, it is not agrarian. It does not pull down, it builds up. It degrades no one, it elevates all. It does not bring down the high, but it raises the low. It does not make the rich poor, but it makes the poor richer, more comfortable, and more happy. Its object is to shed life, and light, and happiness, to plant in the wilderness new Commonwealths, the church, the school-house, and the free-hold home, and to push forward the car of civilization and Christianity. The effect of the bill will be not only to augment the aggregate of national agricultural production, but also to increase to a vast extent the amount of consumption, affording to manufacturers and mechanics, to commerce and navigation, new fields for profit and employment. It will make of those now helplessly poor and oppressed, independent free-holders, having an interest in the soil and in the Government, and doubly patriotic and attached to their country, because of the generous interest and care evinced by that Government in providing homes for them and their families.

How shall the Government more effectually advance its own welfare or add to its strength? It is among the tillers of the soil where we most generally find the men of strong arms and brave hearts, and those virtues of honesty, frugality, and firmness, and patriotism, which must ever constitute the tending and imperishable bulwarks of national strength and national security.

Mr. JONES. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to accept this modification of his amendment: Strike out, in the third line of the section, the words "head of a family," and insert "twenty-one years of age." It will then read, "who is twenty-one years of age, and a citizen of the United States," &c.

Mr. YATES. I will accept the modification proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DENT. I would inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee, if, when he says "any person," he means female as well as male?

Mr. JONES. I suppose that is what it means.

The question was put upon the adoption of the amendment; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 60, noes 20; no quorum voting.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand tellers upon the adoption of the amendment.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. JONES. I must ask that the amendment may be once again reported to the committee.

It was again reported.

Messrs. BOCKOCK, and LANE of Indiana, were appointed tellers.

Mr. McMULLIN. Is the amendment amendable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to move to amend it.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move to insert the words "any male citizen over twenty-one years of age." [Cries of "Oh, no."]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, I hope the gentleman will make it females instead of males. These bachelors ought not to be given land. [A laugh.]

Mr. McMULLIN. Several gentlemen around me insist that I must withdraw my amendment, and I will do so.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. YATES,] as modified at the instance of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] would make the clause read, "that any person who is twenty-one years of age, and a citizen," &c. Now, before the question is taken on that, I propose to amend it so as to make it read, "that any male person who is twenty-one years of age, and any female person who is eighteen years of age," &c.

You are well aware, Mr. Chairman, although probably the committee do not understand it, that in the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, a young lady is, by law, of age at eighteen years. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, and accepted by the gentleman from Illinois, seems to imply some invidious distinction between the sexes.

I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to say, with the indulgence of the committee, that when a bill, similar to this, was up for consideration at the last session of Congress, I felt it my duty, for several reasons, to oppose it.

I was constrained to oppose it, although it passed the House by a large majority, for the reason that the person making application at a land office for the benefits of the bill then under consideration, was required to file his affidavit that he was not the owner of any real estate, so that if an industrious citizen of the country had accumulated fifty or a hundred dollars—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. The time allowed for general debate on the bill has terminated, and we are now acting under the five-minutes rule, which requires that gentlemen shall confine themselves to the amendments under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so ruled.

Mr. JONES. The provision, about which the gentleman is speaking, is not in this bill at all.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am aware of that fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am only referring, by way of showing my reasons for at present sustaining this bill. I shall endeavor to confine myself within the rules. I have the bill before me, proposed by an honorable gentleman who represented the State of Tennessee, in part, at the last Congress, and who now fills the gubernatorial chair of that State. I shall not call the attention of the committee to what I do not deem important. I invite attention to the following:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, upon the application to the register of the land office, in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the said register, that he or she is the head of a family, and is not the owner of any estate in land at the time of such application, and has not disposed of any estate in land to obtain the benefits of this act; and upon making the affidavit as above required, and filing the affidavit with the register, he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the quantity of land already specified."—Congressional Globe, vol. 24, part 2, page 1349.

Now, as I suggested, that was one of the reasons why I felt myself constrained to vote against that bill at the last session. Many of my constituents, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is sorry to have to inform the gentleman that he must confine his remarks to the amendment under consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will presently show the application of my remarks to the amendment.

Mr. HUNT. The gentleman is perfectly in order to pursue that line of argument which leads to the conclusion that he is pressing on the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that it is not in order for the gentleman to give reasons why he voted against the bill at the last session on a motion to insert females with males. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR. I will show the reasons why I shall now vote for the bill, if it be properly framed. If the amendment which I propose be adopted, it will be one reason why I shall vote for the bill. If I can get an amendment in this bill which will give the young men of the country of twenty-one, and such of the young ladies at eighteen, equal benefits under it with other citizens of the United States, it shall have my hearty support. Is that pertinent to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That is in order.

Mr. TAYLOR. Now, sir, I am in favor of making liberal grants to the States for railroad purposes, if you please, in alternate sections, as is proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, [Mr. DISNEY.] On a reëxamination of this bill, especially that framed by my friend before me, [Mr. DAWSON,] which avoids many of the improprieties and inconsistencies of the bill of the last Congress, I am constrained to believe that it is only a portion of the same policy, which I have invariably advocated, of granting land in alternate sections for railroad purposes, to the States of the Union. I think that I am only enlarging it when I grant to each of the individual settlers of the country the same alternate quarters of sections.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to know whether the amendment is susceptible of division. There is one portion of it which I am unwilling to vote for. There is another which I can support. I can very cheerfully vote for that portion of the amendment which proposes to give the land to the young lady of eighteen, and the young gentleman of twenty-one. If he is not married, it is his fault. If it is not his fault, he is not entitled to any land.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. How many unmarried men did you command in Mexico?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not mean to say anything personal to the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. I do not expect anything under the bill. I waive all right.

Mr. DENT. Is an amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, there being an amendment to an amendment now pending.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "any" the words "free white," so that it shall read, "that any free white person who is the head of a family," &c.

I am, Mr. Chairman, a friend of this bill generally, and can also cheerfully support the details of this bill, and I hope that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. DAWSON] will throw no obstacle in the way of the amendment which I propose.

Mr. DAWSON, (interrupting.) I suggest to my colleague that his amendment is surplusage.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not know in regard to that. I know that some States—

Mr. DAWSON. My friend from Pennsylvania is a very good lawyer, and he knows very well that the supreme court of Pennsylvania have decided that the term "citizen" means "white men."

Mr. WRIGHT. I will state, for the benefit of my colleague, that the case known as Hobbs vs. Fogg, decided by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, previous to the adoption of our amended constitution, decided that a negro there was not a citizen. I argued that case in the court below, and also argued it, on appeal, in the court above, and I know that such was the decision in Pennsylvania.

But the convention which met for the purpose of amending our constitution, incorporated the words "free white" in the constitution of the State, and those words are now in that instrument.

I am informed, also, that other States have decided that negroes are not citizens. I do not think that the question should be left as an open question here. I prefer that this House should put its own construction upon it, and that will settle the matter, leaving no ground for quibbling or difficulty hereafter. I do not think I can give my support to this bill, unless this amendment is incorporated into the bill. I have no prejudice in regard to color. [Laughter.]

My remarks seem to create some amusement, and I will ask the indulgence of the committee to state what I mean. I mean that I am not the enemy of the negro, but I love the white man more. That is what I mean by not having any prejudice in regard to color.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would interrupt the gentleman, and inquire whether he proposes his amendment to come in the third line, before the word "person?"

Mr. WRIGHT. Before the word person.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair then rules that the amendment is not in order at this time; for that is not a portion of the words proposed to be stricken out by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I withdraw the amendment for the present, and will move it again after that matter is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BARRY. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, by inserting in the third line, after the word "family," the words "or who has arrived at the age of twenty-one years." If the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois be adopted, no man who is less than twenty-one years of age will be entitled to the benefits of the act, even though he be the head of a family. The purpose of the bill is to give homes to the homeless—to all such as may be willing to take possession of the soil, and retain it. The language employed should be as broad as the purposes of the bill. No person who comes within the avowed purposes of the bill should be denied its benefits. The man who, by the laws of his country, is allowed to contract marriage, even though laboring under the disabilities of minority in respect to some other civil rights, is not without the pale of the advantages of this bill. The younger he is, and the less competent to provide for himself, the stronger is his claim to protection from the law.

Nor is there reason to limit the extension of this act to males only. If a female desires to possess a home, and is willing to conform to the requirements of the law, there is no reason why she should be an alien to the justice or the charity of her country. If she is unfettered by marriage ties she has the same natural right to be provided a home from the public domain that the unmarried man of the same age has. And if she is a widow, though under the age of twenty-one, the reason is still stronger in her favor. Yet the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would deny to all heads of families, however great their necessities, the benefits of this act who chance to be less than twenty-one years of age—thus visiting the fault of early marriages with the penalty of a temporary exclusion from a free share of the public domain. My amendment will make this clause of the section read thus: "That any person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and a citizen of the United States," &c. The amendment will accomplish both objects which gentlemen desire. It not only extends the benefits of the act to all unmarried citizens of the age of twenty-one years, but also to those heads of families, male or female, who are under twenty-one years of age. Thus will be included all who are heads of families, and whom the law recognizes as of an age to act and contract for themselves.

Mr. YATES. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. BARRY. I would suggest, in order to make the sentence grammatical, a mere verbal amendment, that the word "years" be inserted after the word "and," in the third line.

The CHAIRMAN. If no objection is made, the word "years" will be inserted in the place indicated by the gentleman, as it is a mere verbal amendment.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I propose to amend the amendment, so as to provide that those persons who are not heads of families shall have eighty acres of land.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inform the gentleman from Arkansas that that subject is not embraced in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois. It is another part of the bill, not now under consideration. When the amendment now under consideration is voted upon, then the amendment which the gentleman desires to offer will be in order. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. YATES,] upon which tellers were ordered. The tellers will again resume their places.

The tellers then resumed their places, and the question being taken, they reported—ayes 80, a further count not being demanded.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. I now renew my amendment, to insert before the word "persons," the words "free white," so that it will read "any free white person."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word to the chairman of the committee, [Mr. DAWSON,] who seems to think this amendment would be simply a matter of surplusage, because, whenever the location came to be made, it would involve the question of citizenship. Now, sir, there has been a great diversity of opinion upon this matter of citizenship. I understand, from my friend from Ohio, that the courts of that State have decided that a half-blood negro is a citizen of that State, according to the provisions of their constitution. I believe in the State of Massachusetts it has been decided that a negro, whether a full or a half-blood, is a citizen, within the meaning of the constitution of that State, and of the United States.

As I have before said, it has been decided in Pennsylvania that neither a half-blood nor a full-blood negro is entitled to the privileges of citizenship under the Constitution and laws of the country, and subsequently the purport of that decision was incorporated in the constitution which was adopted by the people of the State. Now, with the view I take of the subject, it is desirable that this bill should be relieved of all questions of judicial decision that may arise in giving it construction. I do not know why objection is made by my colleague to this provision being incorporated in the bill.

It would, perhaps, be good policy, so far as the southern portion of the Union is concerned, to make some provision by which they could discharge their old, worn-out, broken-down servants, by sending them into our western Territories, and giving them each farms under the provisions of this bill. That would be a strong southern argument, but I doubt very much whether it would be an argument that would have weight and character with the population that is designed to settle this western country.

I approve of the principles of the bill. I give it my hearty approval and concurrence. The features of it are right, and I believe, as my colleague, [Mr. Dawson,] the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, said in his remarks the other day, that there is no one feature in the legislation of the country that can contribute more to the strength, and power, and honor of the nation than the throwing open of these public lands to the settlements to be made by citizens of the United States, or persons who have filed their declarations of intention to become such. I am willing to go for all the provisions of the bill, even for that in regard to those persons who have filed their declarations of intention, but I must say that I make this amendment which I offer, so far as I am concerned, a sine qua non. I will not agree that the black population of this country shall be put on an equal footing with the citizens of the country, and those who may become citizens of the country, in location and settlement upon the public lands. I am opposed to degrading our own race, which we should do by putting negroes upon an equality with us in making these lands subject to entry by them.

Mr. DAWSON. Will my colleague hear me for a moment?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. Dawson] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. DAWSON. It was never contemplated for a moment that the black population of this country should be put on an equality with the white population, in the enjoyment of the benefits of this bill. Not at all. The language of the bill was intended to secure its provisions and privileges only to the white population of the country; and I was, therefore, surprised to hear my colleague raising the question, as if there could be any doubt as to the word "citizen" meaning a white man. He well knows that that is the decision of the courts of Pennsylvania; and, as I am informed, it is the decision of the courts of a number of the other States of the Union. I regard the proposition to amend, by inserting the word "white," as wholly unnecessary, and it perhaps might endanger the passage of the bill.

Mr. KEITT. I desire to ask the gentleman if he regards the free black in any State a citizen?

Mr. DAWSON. Not at all in reference to the privileges conferred by this bill. I consider that the amendment of my colleague, if adopted, would be surplusage; but if the committee see proper to adopt it, in order to remove even the apprehension of doubt, certainly I have no great objection to it.

Mr. DENT. I desire to make an inquiry. I understand that a certain class of free negroes in the State of New York—those worth $250—are allowed to vote, and thereby are considered as citizens of that State. Now if they are citizens of the State of New York, are they not citizens of the United States? I understand that the pending amendment is to exclude the colored population from the benefits of the bill. Now, how can you do that if persons of this class, when worth $250, are regarded as citizens? How can you exclude those who are recognized as citizens by a sovereign State?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must inform the gentleman from Georgia that debate is exhausted on this amendment. The gentleman can, however, offer an amendment to the amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dawson] has occupied five minutes in opposing the amendment of his colleague.

Mr. DAVIS, of Rhode Island. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Wright,] and I trust the committee will not adopt it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on that amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not understand the gentleman's colleague [Mr. Dawson] as opposing it.

The CHAIRMAN. No further discussion is in order on that amendment. The gentleman can offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I move to strike out the word "free." I trust that this House will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Wright,] but that they will leave this question as it is in the bill, and open to that construction which the laws may put on it. It is a cruel deed to outlaw any set of men; to leave no place in this great land where a man can go, because his skin is not colored like ours; to inflict on him this odious mark of distinction by which he shall be shut out everywhere, and then to complain that he is a degraded being, and not fit for any place. I trust that this great committee of the Representatives of the United States will not allow themselves to take such a step on this occasion. We are now preparing a bill which is large, liberal, and just, and in its spirit contemplates the improvement of all classes of the community, and in God's name why should this class be excluded? Why should we indulge in the prejudices of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Wright,] and adopt such an amendment as the one he has proposed?

In our State, and in other States, the colored man is just as much a citizen as the whitest man there. In Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New York, and, I believe, in most of the free States, he is a citizen under the laws, and he may go there, under the Constitution of the United States, and claim his rights as a citizen. The Constitution protects him to the fullest extent. Gentlemen, in my opinion, in putting such a clause as that in the bill violate the spirit of our Constitution, which makes no such distinction. And we are introducing here a principle which is extending the principle of slavery all over the land; and, for one, I protest against it in the name of our common humanity and our common rights.

I know that these men make good citizens. They are industrious, and they should be left to occupy the soil which their fathers have cultivated, and which they have cultivated; which, for the last one hundred years, they have done more to develop than any part of our countrymen; and to defend which they shed their blood during the Revolution. These things should not be forgotten, and that very territory is the joint result of that labor and that contest. These colored men, and I say it here, have contributed as much as any people of this country to secure it; and it is the cruelest injustice to shut them out from it; a wrong beyond which you cannot go.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Wright] says that he has no prejudices. It is not that he loves them less, but his own race more. The truth is, a man who tramples on the rights of any set of men hardly knows what justice or love is. [Laughter.] But he finds it out at last, that justice is a hard word. It means to protect the poor and the oppressed, to extend to them the full measure of their rights; and in this case I trust that this committee, who are legislating for the people of the United States, will not adopt this invidious principle. I say, sir, that the colored man can go there under that bill, because he is a citizen of the States, and every citizen of a State has the rights of every citizen of all the States. I know that this principle is violated in one half of the States of the Union, but it is nevertheless true and sound.

Mr. DAWSON. In employing the language in this bill I consulted the Constitution of the United States as to the literal and legal meaning of the word citizen, and framed it in reference to the very language employed there, in defining the qualifications of representatives of the United States. I will read from the second section of the first article, which is as follows:

"No person shall be a representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and have been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."

It does not appear that the framers of the Constitution deemed it necessary to qualify the word "citizen." No one understood the import of language better than James Madison, who drafted that instrument. Taking it for granted, then, that the word citizen means nothing more and nothing less than a white man, I adopted it, and for so doing furnish the authority of the Constitution itself.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to ask my colleague a question.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order at this time. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Rhode Island. I withdraw it, if there be no objection.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The question was put, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting before the word "white" the words "more than one half."

I propose this amendment for the purpose of rendering the original amendment ridiculous. That gentleman [Mr. Wright] has expressed his abhorrence of the colored man. By what right has he done it? Have they not fought for the liberties which he enjoys? Have they not bled that he and I may be freemen? Have they not shed their blood upon every battle-field of the Revolution? Did not they stand by General Jackson at New Orleans? Sir, but a few years ago you and I sat in this Hall deliberating upon the value of a colored man who spoke and wrote with facility four different languages, and I doubt whether the gentleman himself can do that. I mean no offense to "niggers." [Laughter.]

Sir, I intended to create no laughter; but when I see an attempt to wield the power of this House for oppression I care not whence it comes, I cannot refrain from raising my voice against it. We were formed into a Government to protect the rights of the weak; to elevate the oppressed; to do good to our fellow-men; "to do unto them as we would they should do unto us." We have brought these people from their native land, and are we to persecute them and trample them in the dust? Is that the voice of the free representatives of the old Keystone State? But a few years ago the colored man had the right of suffrage in that State.

In my own State to-day some of its best citizens, and some of the most intelligent citizens, are men who have colored blood in their veins; they are authorized to hold offices, and to be Governors of the State; and yet, under the construction of the proposed amendment of the gentleman, they must be excluded from the benefits of this bill.

On behalf of that class of men I protest against it here and everywhere. Let them have the right to settle upon this land, and support themselves and their children. I did not intend to make any speech, but having thrown out these suggestions, and having obtained my object, I now ask leave of the committee to withdraw the amendment I offered.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The question was taken on Mr. GIDDINGS's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon Mr. WRIGHT's amendment, it was taken, and decided in the negative.

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded tellers upon the amendment; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHAMBERLAIN and VAIL were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 66.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. I offer the following amendment: After the words "United States," insert "that any unmarried white man over nineteen years of age, or any white female over eighteen years of age, a citizen thereof."

I was in favor, Mr. Chairman, of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, proposing to extend the privileges of this bill to young men eighteen years of age, but as that was voted down by the committee, I propose the age of nineteen. There is no reason why we should exclude our young men from the benefits of this public domain, if it is to be disposed of in this manner. But, on the contrary, there is great justice and great propriety in giving these lands to our young men, who are bound by the laws of the land to serve their country whenever they are called on. At the age of eighteen years a young man may be drafted into the service of the country in time of war; and it has been found that at such time the largest class of voluntary enlistments come from this class.

Now, sir, there are many men not more than nineteen years of age who are not heads of families, but who are capable of taking care of themselves—who are capable of going out into our western wilderness, and providing themselves with a homestead, and who would provide themselves with wives afterwards. It is true that our young men are not all married at the age of nineteen, and many of them are not on account of their poverty. I have proposed to grant this privilege to young men nineteen years old because I believe there is a great deal of justice in it; and I propose that young women of eighteen years of age shall be entitled to the land also. It is true, as has been said, that when young men twenty-one years of age are not married, it is generally their own fault; but it is also true that there are a great many young ladies eighteen years of age who are unmarried, though that is not their fault. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN, (interrupting.) The Chair must interrupt the gentleman. A portion of the amendment offered by him is incompatible with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. YATES,] and adopted by the committee.

Mr. DENT. What is it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair alludes to the provision prescribing twenty-one years of age.

Mr. DENT. This applies only to men, I believe?

The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

Mr. DENT. Then I go it for the women. [Great laughter.]

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to ask a single question. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the ladies of Indiana marry at the age of eighteen?

Mr. DENT. Some of them marry at sixteen.

Mr. FLORENCE. I did not know at what time they did marry, and I was desirous of being informed.

Mr. DENT. It was remarked, by a gentleman who occupied the floor a short time since, that if young men were not married at the age of twenty-one it was their own fault. I say it is not the fault of young ladies that they are not all married at the age of eighteen. It is but a few days since that a bill passed this House granting one hundred and sixty acres of land to a young lady who went into the Army and served her country in the war with Mexico. Now, I suppose that there are hundreds of young ladies in your western country, in destitute circumstances, perhaps widows, who would, probably, gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of securing one hundred and sixty acres of land by settling upon it; and I have no doubt but that their lovers would accompany them, and help them to build shanties thereon, for the purpose of bringing them within the purview of the law.

I hope that my amendment, so far as it relates to ladies under eighteen years of age, will be adopted. If that portion of the bill in reference to young men has been perfected, it is, of course, too late to amend it; but I do insist that the principle is correct, that when a man is bound to serve his country, he ought to be entitled to the privilege of receiving land at the hands of the Government.

I have no objection to that portion of the bill with reference to those who have filed a declaration with the intention to become citizens, but I will take this occasion to say that the poor people who come to this country from Europe are not able to reach these lands. It is only the rich people, who bring money with them, who will be able to avail themselves of the benefits of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, there never was a more stupendous speculation gotten up in the House of Representatives than this bill. It will operate as the emigration to Texas did. The rich millionaires of the northern cities will pick up out of the gutters men who, unaided, would never be able to get ten miles, and send them out by thousands to the western country, to settle these lands upon share—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman from Georgia proposes to extend still further the class of persons who are to be at liberty to seize upon and appropriate to themselves the lands belonging, not to us, but to the United States, and for that reason I am opposed to his amendment. Sir, it cannot be denied that this bill is in conformity with the spirit of the present age—"the spirit of progress." Such progress! Sir, at the last Congress, when this bill, or another bill of the same nature, to the great amazement of the country, was introduced, it proposed to restrict the privileges granted by it to those who are the heads of families, and who are worth less than $500. Now, it is proposed to give a quarter section of land to every citizen of the United States, whether he be the head of a family or not, who is over the age of twenty-one.

Sir, if any gentleman were to introduce a proposition into this House to cede to the States, in which the public lands lie, all of those lands, it would be regarded as a very extravagant proposition on the part of the new States; and yet the present bill is infinitely better for them and infinitely more injurious to the old States, for by it, you will, in effect, give to the States in which the public lands lie every foot of such territory, and you give to them also a useful class of population which you attract to them by the promise of one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands; you take from the old States the most enterprising portion of their population, and by granting to every person who may become an inhabitant or a resident of a new State, you increase the strength and wealth of the new States, and their power in the Government by adding to the subjects of taxation. If we must imitate the recklessness of King Lear, let us beware we do not experience his self-reproaches, and realize his fate.

The question was then taken on Mr. DENT's amendment; and it was rejected, on a division, there being only 26 in the affirmative.

Mr. YATES. I move to add the following to the first section:

Provided, That no person shall hereafter be permitted to enter with money, land scrip, warrants, or otherwise, more than one section of the public land.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit to the Chair whether that amendment be in order—whether it be germane to the subject under consideration, to provide for the prevention of entry of land with money, land scrip, warrant, or anything else? If we commence to get these things into the bill we shall never get through with it. I will vote with the gentleman for that provision, when in a bill by itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, that when this bill was under consideration by this committee at the last Congress, a proposition was made to amend, by offering an amendment to graduate the price of the public land, and the then occupant of the Chair held that it was not germane to the bill, and no appeal was taken from that decision. He supposes, in accordance with that construction of the rules of last year, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would not be germane to the subject under consideration.

Mr. YATES. I offer the following amendment: Strike out from the first section the words "one quarter section," and insert "three hundred and twenty acres."

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment with the view of making a speech only. I will withdraw it when I am done. There should be no delay in passing this bill. It will, perhaps, not be a year before nearly every acre of good land now subject to private entry will be taken up. And by whom taken up? By the actual settler? No, sir; by the speculator. We learn, from the report of the commissioner of the General Land Office, that the sales of the public lands, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853, amounted to seven millions two hundred and thirty-five thousand two hundred and eighty-one acres; exceeding the sales of the previous year by over two million acres. Now, sir, of these two million acres thus sold, I hesitate not to say that there was not one million sold for the purposes of immediate actual settlement; so that at least six million acres of these lands have gone into the hands of speculators. In the State of Illinois, during the same year, there were sold two millions eight hundred and seven thousand nine hundred and eighty-one acres. It is very probable that over two and a half million acres of these lands also went into the hands of speculators. I was at the land office in Danville, Illinois, during the last fall, where I found hundreds of speculators; one, sir, who told me he had entered twenty-four thousand acres, and he a non-resident, at that. I found there, sir, several instances in which poor men, who came there to purchase for actual settlement a chosen spot of eighty acres—chosen after weeks of search—found their lands included within the broad area on which the speculator had laid his remorseless grasp. They were compelled to go in search of other lands, at the hazard of like disappointment, or to pay fivefold the Government price for the lands they had hoped to enter. And yet, sir, the President, in his message, says: "It is believed that experience has verified the wisdom and justice of the present system with regard to the public domain, in most essential particulars."

Mr. Chairman, I submit the question, whether the system, as now pursued, is to be our policy in the future as to the lands in the States and Territories? "Has experience justified the wisdom and justice of the system," which permits the wealthy capitalist to purchase these lands in unlimited quantities, and to withhold them from settlement and occupation, to the exclusion of the actual settler? Under the present system, non-residents go into the new States and Territories, and by means of associated capital, enter large tracts of the best land—from one to one hundred thousand acres—which they withhold from settlement and cultivation until the improvements of adjacent lands, made by the hard-handed toil of the actual settler, add tenfold to their value, when they sell them to him at these augmented prices. I oppose such a system, as having the effect to retard the settlement and prosperity of the new States and Territories; as an act of gross and intolerable injustice to the poor and industrious pioneer; and as establishing land monopolies, which have been the curse of every country where they have been suffered to exist. Would it not be better to have these lands in cultivation, divided into farms of moderate size, in the occupation of our poor and industrious families, than to have them entirely absorbed by speculators? I call the attention of the Committee on Public Lands to this subject, and suggest to them the propriety of providing for the sale of the public lands in limited quantities to each purchaser. Under the present system, we are rendering the States and Territories liable to the largest land monopolies the world ever saw. No small part of the calamities and oppressions of the kingdoms of Europe is to be traced to these monopolies of the soil in the crown, and in the hands of a few. Look at Ireland, whose millions of yeomanry are the miserable vassals and tenants of English landlords. Look at England, where some thirty thousand proprietors have the title to the soil. In those, and other countries of Europe, are to be seen, and will be seen and felt for generations to come, all the evils and inequalities growing out of such systems of land monopoly. There are to be seen the fearful contrasts between the luxurious splendor of wealth, on the one hand, and abject want and squalid misery on the other. I know, sir, that, under our laws of descent, we may never expect to witness this contrast to the same appalling extent, yet it cannot be denied that enormous injustice, as well to individuals as to the State, must be the result of our present system of land policy.

It is urged that the passage of this bill will tend to diminish the population of the old States by holding out inducements to emigration. I apprehend that though this may be the case to some extent, yet it will not sensibly affect the prosperity of the old States. But, sir, I cannot believe that the citizens of the old States would so far stifle the feelings of humanity as to desire to prevent the laborer from seeking any portion of our common country where he could better his condition, and release himself from the grasp of want and poverty. There being but few public lands in the district I have the honor to represent, doubtless some of my constituents would seek a home elsewhere on the public lands. And, sir, though I might dislike to part with them, yet I would say to them, "Go where you can find the greatest enjoyment and highest prosperity." Wherever they may locate on our broad domain, they will still be American citizens, protected by the same Constitution, under the folds of the same glorious flag, and united to us by the ties of country and a common humanity.

I care not, Mr. Chairman, what motives may be ascribed to me for the support of this bill. If it shall only become a law I am willing that those who are destitute of those noble pulsations which should sway every man's breast in behalf of his fellow-man, may ascribe what motives they please. I have not been an unmindful observer of the hardships of the laboring man, and I thank God I have a heart full of sympathy for suffering humanity. Wherever I see the laboring man I respect him. It is no disgrace that his hands are soiled by honest labor. It is the essence of our institutions to respect and honor labor; and if we are ever to have an aristocracy in this country, God grant that it may be the aristocracy of free American labor. What little influence I may have here or elsewhere shall be exerted to promote its highest dignity, and to secure to it its highest reward. And it is in this spirit and for this purpose I support this bill. Whenever I see the poor but industrious laborer, with a large family dependent on him for support, struggling against the strong current of adversity and poverty; whenever I see him tottering beneath his heavy load, as he toils with unsteady step up the scaffold of the rich man's edifice; or when I see him in the back ground upon the corner of another's farm, barely able to obtain a scanty subsistence, and without the means of educating his children, it is then I think of this bill. It is then, sir, that the vision of a bright, sweet home for that man, in the valley of the Nebraska, on the hill side, in the forest glade, or "where the prairie sparkles with flowers," rises up before me.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that we may this very day send this bill to the Senate, with the prestige of a large majority in its favor, and that that body, in response to the almost universal sentiment of the country in its favor, will act upon it and pass it without delay.

Mr. LETCHER. Our Illinois friends seem rather hard to please. The gentleman who has just addressed the House [Mr. YATES] objects to any man going into the State of Illinois to buy land, if he goes from one of the old States. At the same time, he is perfectly willing that the land should be given away, without reimbursing the Government the actual cost of purchase, survey, and bringing the land into market. Not only so, he is perfectly willing to donate it to a corporation, without even a restriction as to the time at which the land should be sold. Why is it that there was not some indignation expressed at such a donation? Why is it that those lands can go into the hands of private, soulless, moneyed corporations, and yet these same gentlemen feel no compunctious visitings at this result?

We have made grants of what are called the swamp lands, and I know how the act in relation thereto has been executed. One of the most respectable men of my own district (Mr. David Vanmeter, of Hardy county, Virginia,) in 1852, went to the west and selected twelve hundred acres of land for his son, and in 1853 he selected twelve hundred acres more for another son, for the express purpose of farming, and for no other purpose in the world; carefully avoiding everything like swamp lands, and yet when his certificates were returned to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in order that he might get his patents, he found that the State of Illinois was claiming these very lands so selected under the swamp land act, although there had never been a drop of water upon them, except what had fallen from heaven, or was to be found in the springs or streams thereon. [Laughter.]

I do not understand the policy that these gentlemen are advocating here. If they want to take these lands, if they want to appropriate them to their own use without compensation to the Government, let them take some other course to accomplish the object. Do not make war upon the old States by seeking to withdraw their population by donations of the public lands to those who have no lands.

While this is the case in Illinois, it is the case in many other States. Here are these donations to corporations without restriction; and not only that, but they even undertake to exempt these corporations from all taxation upon their private property for six years, and upon the lands until they are sold. I would like to see their preaching and practice correspond in the disposition of the public lands. When these gentlemen make war upon this ground, I would like to see their acts correspond with their professions. I wish to see them carry out the rule which they prescribe for others as the proper rule to be observed.

Mr. BRIDGES. I move that the committee rise.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and by special order House bill No. 37, commonly known as the homestead bill, but had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HENN. I move that the House adjourn. The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of Albany, New York; a petition of citizens of Bucks county, Pennsylvania; the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Lockport, New York; the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Auburn, New York; a petition of citizens of New York; and certain resolutions passed at a meeting of citizens of Oneida, New York, protesting against the passage of the bill to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas without a prohibition of slavery therein; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Also, the petition of Thomas C. Nye, praying indemnity for the violation, by the Post Office Department, of his contract for the transportation of the mails; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. EVERETT presented the memorial of Mary Baury, widow of Louis Baury, an officer during the war of the Revolution, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CASS presented a memorial signed by mechanics and others, citizens of the United States, praying Congress to enact such laws as will best secure the protection of American citizens in the enjoyment of their rights of conscience, and of religious worship in foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, a petition of the citizens of the State of Michigan, remonstrating against a reciprocal international copyright treaty between the United States and Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of inhabitants of Chester, Massachusetts, and a petition of citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, protesting against any repeal of the prohibition of slavery, or the addition of slave territory to the Union, immediate or prospective, such as is proposed in the Nebraska bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of inhabitants of the town of Winchendon, Massachusetts, praying a reduction in the present rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. EVERETT presented the petition of George M. Farnum, praying the reimbursement of expenses incurred by him while United States Consul at the Mauritius, on account of destitute American citizens; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ADAMS presented the petition of David Gordon, praying that an act may be passed for the settlement of his accounts as examiner of the land offices in Louisiana and Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Gustavus G. Cushman be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. SUMNER, it was Ordered, That the administrator of Joseph H. Whipple have leave to withdraw his petition and papers, in order that they may be presented in the House of Representatives.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Lucy Tate be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following petitions, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed:

Petition of the heirs of Joseph Pomroy;

Petition of the administrator of Joseph Richardson;

Petition of James A. Glanding; and Petition of Phæbe Hascall.

He also, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Absalom Kyle and William C. Kyle, praying the compensation for transporting the mail due according to the terms of their contract, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of McCalmont, Greaves & Co., praying that certain duties imposed on goods imported by them into the port of Vera Cruz, during the late war with Mexico, may be refunded, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of E. J. McLane, praying compensation for expenses incurred in seizing horses and mules smuggled into the United States from Mexico, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Green Bay and Depere, Wisconsin, reported a bill to extend the limits of the collection district of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution to inquire into the subject, reported a bill to constitute Keokuk, in the State of Iowa, a port of delivery; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William Harris, of Georgia, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

LAKEPORT, LOUISIANA.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of the Jefferson and Lake Ponchartrain Railway, reported a bill to establish a port of delivery at Lakeport, on Lake Ponchartrain, and for other purposes, and asked for its present consideration.

The bill was accordingly read twice, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to establish at the terminus of the Jefferson and Lake Ponchartrain Railway, on Lake Ponchartrain, a port of delivery, to embrace, also, the lake terminus of the new canal, to be called Lakeport; to direct that a surveyor shall reside there; that all ships or vessels bound to it shall, after proceeding thereto, making a report and entry at the port of New Orleans within the time limited by law, be permitted to unload their cargoes at Lakeport, under the rules and regulations prescribed by law; that all vessels about to depart from there to foreign places shall be permitted to clear out with their cargoes at the custom-house in New Orleans, and depart under the same rules as vessels departing for foreign places from New Orleans, by way of the Mississippi river.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. FISH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill to prevent unnecessary delays in the unloading of cargoes arriving from foreign ports; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution submitted by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] directing John C. Rives to furnish an additional number of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment. I ask for its consideration at this time.

Objection was made, as the morning business was not disposed of; so the resolution lies over, under the rules.

PORTRAITS OF THE PRESIDENTS.

Mr. FISH offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be directed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing, for the use of the Executive mansion, a series of portraits of the first five Presidents of the United States, painted by Gilbert Stuart for the late Colonel George Gibbs, and now in the possession of his family.

STEAM CONDENSERS.

Mr. BENJAMIN offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to the Senate what action, if any, has been taken by his Department under that clause of the naval appropriation bill of the 31st of August, 1852, which authorizes the Secretary of the Navy "to apply steam condensers to one or more of the steam vessels belonging to the United States, for furnishing fresh water to marine boilers, and for the use of the crew," together with all information in his possession on the subject-matter of this resolution.

RICHARD M. YOUNG.

The resolution directing the payment of $974 20 to Richard M. Young, for his services as special commissioner for the investigation of charges against the Hon. Alexander Ramsey, was read a third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STUART. It was understood that the resolution which I offered some time ago, instructing the Committee on Commerce to report a river and harbor bill, was to have been voted upon yesterday. I move that the Senate now proceed to consider that resolution.

Mr. FOOT. With the leave of the Senator from Michigan, I will ask that the bill which was ordered to be engrossed yesterday may now have its third reading.

Mr. STUART. I yield to the Senator from Vermont in that particular, although I am anxious to have my resolution considered; and therefore I withdraw my motion.

INDIGENT INSANE.

The engrossed bill making a grant of the public lands to the several States and Territories of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons, was read a third time.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, this bill, as I understand it, is a departure, a very great departure, from any previous policy, varied as that policy has been, in regard to the public lands. I am free to confess that it is somewhat difficult to resist the appeal which has been made to the Senate upon this subject, because it is addressed only to the sensibilities of the Senate. Now, sir, in the former dispositions of the public lands, varied as I have said they have been, I am not aware that any disposition has been made of them, but with some regard to political considerations.

The public lands have formed a most disturbing element in the councils of the nation for many years. The disposition which has been made of them has gone far, in my judgment, to unhinge the Constitution and all constitutional action.

There is now a bill depending, as we are aware, which will probably be before us—a bill which has heretofore been before the Senate—to give these lands away—to give them away to the first comers, whether they be citizens or foreigners. Even that bill has some political considerations connected with it, because it is said, and properly said, that when you invite settlers into a wilderness and give them a portion of the land, the improvements which they will make will more than remunerate the Government for the gratuity, in the appreciation of the adjacent lands. There is, then, some pretext, at least a political consideration, which might lead to the passage of such a bill.

Then there is another class of bills, several of which passed the Senate the other day, because it was idle to object to them on the part of those who think as I do that it is an improvident, if not an unconstitutional disposition; I mean the class of bills giving the public lands to railroad companies, or to States to construct railroads. But even there, again, there is to be found some political element, or some shade of a political element, because of the alleged appreciation of the lands through which these roads will pass.

But, sir, what is this bill? Has it any such element connected with it at all? Is it addressed to any other considerations than to those which are purely moral? Is it a bill which makes the Federal Government the grand almoner of the States, and gives them the lands, not for political purposes, but to be used altogether in charity? If there be one consideration which can be urged by any advocate of this bill, except that it is charitable to pass it, I am at a loss to know what that consideration is.

Sir, the bill proposes that you shall give these public lands according to a stated ratio among the States, to endow hospitals for the maintenance and cure, if they be curable, of a certain class of patients—the indigent insane. Now, sir, I put it to the Senate, and through the Senate I hope I shall put it to the country, if it is competent for Congress to constitute itself an almoner for the States, and distribute charity for the benefit of the indigent insane, is it not equally competent for Congress to take charge of the poor of the States? What earthly difference is there between the two cases? Why should we not just as well strike out "insane" from the bill and give these lands to the States for their "indigent"—their poor, whether insane or not? The principle is entirely the same. And if we can give land to the States to maintain their poor, I ask you, sir, what department in the police of the States is there which this Government may not invade, and take from the control of the States; and may they not administer the police regulations of the States at their pleasure? This bill is an entering wedge.

Sir, what right have we to do this? In what relation does this Government stand to the public lands? Is it in the relation of an owner, to dispose of them at the caprice or the pleasure of the Congress, for the time being; or does it hold them as a trust, to be administered as a trust, and treated as a trust? Why, if we may give lands for the benefit of the indigent insane, what limit can you place upon the power of disposing of the public property?

Sir, the bill requires of the States that they shall treat these lands, and the proceeds of their sales, as a sacred fund, and administer it exclusively for the support of one class of charities; and the argument addressed to us is, that the indigent insane are a class of our fellow-beings who appeal more strongly to our sensibilities than any other class of our fellow-citizens; and that is the whole argument. It is, that they are a class of our fellow-beings, who, because of their condition, being deprived of reason, appeal more strongly to our sensibilities than any other class; and, therefore, it is incumbent—to do what? On Congress to interfere for their relief and for their support. Why is it more incumbent on Congress to interfere for them than for any other class, I care not what it may be? I admit that if we can maintain an argument addressed to our sensibilities, these people are more deserving the care and protection of the Government than any other class; but you must at last solve the question whether the Government has authority to interfere for any class; and if it has not authority to interfere for one, it certainly has not for another.

Now, sir, is not this that sickly sentimentality which was so properly and so appropriately exposed here on this floor, the other day, by my friend from the State of South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER?]. Cannot the States take care of their poor, whether they are insane or merely indigent? Is it not the duty of the States to take care of their poor, and are they not now doing it? I am not aware that there is a State in the Union—although there may be—which has not, in the discharge of its appropriate duty, provided hospitals for this class of patients, as the States provide poor-houses for those who are unable to work.

If there be any State where this duty is neglected, it has been neglected not because of want of ability in the State itself, but on account of want of inclination. And what are we to do? We are to give a fund to those who do not want it, or to those who will misuse it; for, my word for it, if I know anything of human nature, there is not a State in the Union which has felt it an obligation on itself to provide for the indigent insane, which will not do it at their own will, entirely independent of this gratuity; and if there be a State in the Union which has not done it, it will neglect the fund and allow it to be depredated upon, and to rust away.

I am very much concerned at the necessity which requires of me, against the sensibilities of my own nature, to oppose such a bill. I have been strongly and importunately addressed from other quarters, in reference to this bill; and if I could yield what I consider a public duty, to indulge the emotions of my own heart, I should not be here to oppose it. But when I know that there is not one argument addressed to us to pass the bill, except such as would constitute the Government a great almoner for the States, for one I am not at liberty to vote for it.

Sir, it would be a dangerous precedent; an exceedingly dangerous one. If the Constitution authorizes that disposition of the public property, I defy the wit of man to say in what form it may not be taken.

You may throw it as a largess among the people; you may place it under the control of an aspirant for political power, through his party or his friends, to use it to make a gratuity; until you bring the American people into the condition of the Romans when they looked to their Government only for two things—for bread, and for the games of the circus; a state demoralizing to the public morals.

While the question presents in the attractive guise of a charity—a charity for a class of people, who, unfortunately, most need it—you are setting a precedent which will unsettle and unhinge every condition or feature of the trust in reference to the public domain. I desire only to express my opinion on the bill, so that if it passes, they may go upon the record with the bill. I desire that whatever name I may leave behind me as a statesman, may not be in any way coupled or connected with a bill which constitutes the Government the almoner of the States, in the disposal of a charity. I trust—though I hardly think it—that it will be the pleasure of the Senate to reject the bill.

Mr. WALKER. When this bill was before the Senate at a former period, I voted against it. I shall vote for it now, and for the reason that the objections which I heretofore entertained to the bill, have been obviated by the changed form given to it by the Committee on Public Lands. When this bill first made its appearance, as I understood it, and I believe it was conceded that it was properly so understood, it would have given the right to one State to be the proprietor of the soil in another State. To that I could not give my assent. When that objection was obviated, the rule by which the distribution was to be made I could not assent to. I think now that that objection has been obviated, and I cannot make any distinction between the bill as it stands, proposing an appropriation of land for these purposes, and that which has been done by this Government from its foundation to the present moment. If there be any difference, I should be pleased if the Senator from Virginia would point it out. I cannot discover any difference in principle between this grant and those which have been made from the foundation of the Government for school purposes. Now, we know that contemporaneously with the formation of the Constitution, the policy of granting lands absolutely to the States for educational purposes obtained—

A SENATOR. Individually, to the land States. Mr. WALKER. I will come to that presently. That policy has been continued to the admission of the last State into the Union; and I venture to say that no State will be admitted, in which there is public lands, but where the same policy will be observed and pursued.

It is said, however, that these grants for educational purposes, were not to the States generally, but to the States individually, in which public lands were found. Why, sir, that is more objectionable than that to which the Senator from Virginia now seems to object. That was a partial gratuity. Those lands for educational purposes were given to the individual States; and yet it is claimed that the public lands are the patrimony of all the States; and now, when this bill—the first bill, I believe, which has ever been before Congress proposing to make an equitable and equal distribution of this patrimony among the whole of the States—is before us, it is objected to, while individual appropriations of lands to the States, for agricultural purposes, have been passed silently, and acquiesced in, by the gentlemen who now make this objection.

I think the argument, in the sense in which the Senator from Virginia makes it, would obtain much more strongly to the policy which the Government has pursued of granting these lands to States for agricultural purposes than it would obtain as against the bill for this grant.

Believing, then, that there is nothing in the bill which will allow or permit an infraction by one State, of the sovereignty over the soil of another State, and believing that the ratio of distribution is an equitable and just one, I can vote for the bill as it stands at present, whereas I could not do so before.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, if we can distribute the proceeds of the public lands, or the public lands themselves, generally, among the States, for the benefit of the insane, I cannot see for my life why we may not distribute them for every other purpose. I had supposed that one of the great principles upon which the Democratic party rested; one of the issues upon which it had been accustomed heretofore to do battle, was, that it was improper, and, as many believed, unconstitutional, for this Government to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States. Now, how can you deny that power, or that propriety, if you pass such a bill as this? For myself, I would rather vote for a bill which would distribute, upon some equitable proportion, among the States generally, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, than pass a bill like this, which admits the power and the propriety; and, in addition to that, pursues the fund into the hands of the States, and undertakes to say how far they shall administer their municipal affairs; how they shall apply the fund to the matter of taking care of the insane.

But the Senator from Wisconsin says that we have heretofore granted school sections—to whom? Why, sir, to the new States, to States which agreed, when admitted into the Union, that, for a certain length of time, they would not tax the land sold by the United States, nor the land of the United States itself. There was some consideration for that; it was founded upon a different principle. If this rests upon any principle whatever, it goes to the entire length of there being a just demand on the part of the States for the distribution of the proceeds of the lands among them. It would do a great deal more good to the States, and be a much better measure than this, to distribute it in that way. Sir, I deny that we ought to be bound by precedents which gentlemen may quote here in regard to particular cases—such precedents as that quoted by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Foor,] when the two Houses, probably under some sudden impulse of humanity, some eloquent appeals to their benevolence, may have been induced to depart, in my opinion, from the true spheres of their duties, and sometimes from that of their constitutional powers.

I admit that he did refer to precedents, in regard to which there was as little propriety in interfering, as there will be in this case. But it is to be recollected that in every case, they came up under just such a specious appeal as does this bill—an appeal to our humanity and our benevolent feelings; and allow me to say, that there is always danger when we resort to this sort of sentimental legislation, and agree to bury all considerations of our obvious and long-settled policy, and banish reason and the Constitution from the view, in order to gratify some such feeling as this. The feeling itself, sir, I admit, is highly commendable; but if, by indulging it, it should lead to a departure from just principles of legislation, it will be found that we injure more than we benefit. For one, I am against it.

Mr. STUART. I have been listening with some little attention to the Senators from Virginia, to see what arguments were to be brought to bear against this proposition. Something has been said, sir, in respect to its unconstitutionality; but I believe neither of those gentlemen has undertaken to point out wherein it is unconstitutional. The Senator from Virginia, who first addressed the Senate, [Mr. Mason,] seemed to think that it might do, under peculiar circumstances—although I understood him to say it never would be very satisfactory to him—to make a distribution of the public lands which involved political considerations, but that it would not do to make a disposition of them which involved moral considerations only.

Now, sir, I can very readily discover the distinction which is sought to be got up, but I confess my entire inability to understand what particular practicability there is in that distinction.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator allow me to put him a question?

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTER. Does he believe that there is a constitutional power in this Government to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States?

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir—I do, I do; and inasmuch as the Senator has put that question to me, I will answer it in its details now. The Democratic party heretofore has asserted that it was not proper to distribute the proceeds of the public lands; and they have contended against it. That party, however, has asserted, time and again, that it was proper to graduate the price of the public lands; and, sir, these same principles, advocated, perhaps, by the same Senators, if not by others entertaining them, have been interposed to prevent it.

Mr. HUNTER. I have never done so.

Mr. STUART. Doubtless the Senator speaks his own sentiments. I speak of all those who oppose these questions. They have refused to graduate the price of the public lands. They have steadily refused to permit the States in which they lie to tax them. They will hold them at a dollar and a quarter an acre, whether they are worth that, or whether they are worth twenty-five cents; and the States in which they lie have no power over them, not even to tax them. What is the consequence? It is, that the new States remain, in these respects, unsettled. The old States, in the other House of Congress, hold the power, and they execute that power with a spirit of despotism. Here, in this body, where the States are equal, the new States have their proper respect in this regard, as well as their proper representation; but reach the other House, where the old States hold the balance of power, and you cannot pass one measure which looks like justice towards the new States.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] throws out an intimation against the bill giving away lands, he says, to actual settlers. Sir, I am for that bill; I am for that principle; and if there be a man in this country who can show any good reasons against it, I will hear him by the fortnight with the utmost pleasure. What does this Government wish? What are its true interests? What are the true interests of the States in which the lands lie? To have settlement, people—moral, upright, Christian citizens of the United States. It is men that give strength to a country, and not land.

Sir, I am for that bill, and it cannot be made too liberal in its provisions to suit me. I am for this bill; and if the Senator had answered the distinction drawn by the Senator from Wisconsin, he would have done what I conceive it to be impossible for any Senator upon this floor to do. There was a time, I concede to the Senator from Virginia, when the States agreed, upon coming into the Union, not to tax the lands sold within a given time—five years; but we have sat here for the last six weeks and heard arguments—and none more able than that made by the Senator himself—seeking to show that Congress has no power to put any such limitation upon a State.

Sir, I think myself that there are some opinions that have been put forth that will come back to plague the inventors; but the Senator did argue that when a State was admitted into this Union, it must be admitted in all respects upon an equal footing with every other State. Now, can South Carolina and Virginia tax the lands which belong to individuals in those States? Has Congress, then, the power to fix upon a new State an inhibition, as a fundamental condition on her coming into the Union, that she shall not tax the lands of individuals for five years? If it can, it can affix it for fifty years; it can affix it for ninety-nine years; it can fix it forever. I belong to another school of opinion. I think it can. I think that the Constitution and laws of the United States are the supreme law of the land. I think that when a State is admitted into the Union, whatever fundamental constitution you affix upon her admission, is the supreme law of the land. Why? Because it is a condition affixed respecting a right that Congress alone possesses—a right to admit new States into the Union. They are admitted by a law of Congress. It passes both Houses; it is approved by the President like any other law. It is a clear exercise of an authority which you alone can possess. And, sir, you are your own judges of what that law should be. Then I would say to the Senator that it is many years since any such consideration existed. Indiana, if I recollect right, was the last State admitted into this Union upon any such condition. There may have been others. Michigan came in with no such limitation; Wisconsin came in with none such; Iowa with none such. We in Michigan had a right to tax the lands of individuals from the moment we were admitted into the Union.

Mr. HUNTER. Have you the right to tax the land of the United States?

Mr. STUART. No, sir; but we have the right to tax the land of individuals. The condition fixed upon the States prior to that time was, that they could not tax public lands sold to individuals for five years after they were sold. That was the condition, and that is the condition which we lived up to; but now it is no such thing. Congress grants the sixteenth section, and to the States that have been admitted lately they grant the thirty-sixth section also—two sections in every township—for the purpose of common schools. They give not less than seventy-two sections to a State for the purposes of a university. I would like to know the distinction, upon constitutional principles, between that case and this. If there is any, I am unable to see it.

But, Mr. President, I subscribe to the reason that is assigned for the passage of this bill. It appeals to my sympathies; it appeals to my heart as well as my head; and while I intend that my head shall, to a proper extent, regulate my heart, I never do intend that my head shall act much without my heart.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I will say, without going into any lengthy remarks upon the subject, that the bill has been carefully drawn in all respects, as I think. It underwent, certainly, a most rigid investigation in the Committee on Public Lands. Several suggestions which emanated from me were adopted by the committee; so that in no event can this fund be diverted; so that the States in which no public lands lie cannot become owners of public lands in the State where they do lie. They cannot divert the fund. And if there is any fraud practiced in disposing of the scrip, there is an express provision in the bill that no patent shall issue for the land on which that scrip shall be located. Everything has been done by this bill which, it seems to me, can be done to secure the funds for the objects intended. Is that new? The Senator from Virginia [Mr. Hunter] complains of this part of the bill. He says that he prefers a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands rather than such a bill as this, because it follows the fund into the hands of the State and controls its disposition. The same thing is true of school lands and university lands. Will Congress make a donation and institute a fund for a State, and not secure the proper appropriation of that fund? Will they leave it to the whim of anybody? Never. It is secured in every bill that I know anything about. Congress institutes a fund, and they say that no power which holds the fund in suberviency to its own power shall have an opportunity of diverting it.

A single word in reply to the suggestion as to the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, and I have done. I never understood that to be denied from a want of constitutional power, but from its being one of the most impolitic things that could be done. You have myriads of officers, and in every man's hand some of this money is to stand to pay him for his services. You collect a fund and you distribute it, and the whole cost of collecting and distributing it is deducted from the concern. It had the effect to keep up the price of the public lands, which was against the interest of the new States. Undoubtedly the true interest of the new States is a disposition of those lands upon some terms. I was ever in favor of the graduation principle, and I am in favor of that principle to-day. But I have seen it again and again put down in committee and in Congress. I am, therefore, for the earliest disposition of these lands that can be made, without any infringement upon the Constitution, that shall induce their settlement and occupancy by people who constitute the strength, as they will the permanency, of this Government. These are briefly some of the reasons why I support this bill.

Mr. BADGER. I desire to say a few words in reply to the Senator from Virginia. If I believed, with the Senator from that State, who first addressed the Senate, [Mr. MASON,] that this bill was the first step in interfering with the municipal administration of the States, I should certainly be as strongly opposed to it as he is. But permit me to say to him, that there is nothing coercive or compulsory upon the States in the bill. It does not undertake to control any one of the States of the Union, and require that that State shall receive the lands which the bill tenders to it. It is an offer to each of the States of so much public lands to be applied to certain purposes, without any intent to control the States in the acceptance of the fund. It seems to me that the honorable Senator might as well say that he would have cause to complain, if some man of vast possessions in the country tendered to him $100,000, to be invested in stocks as an income to be applied to the portioning of his daughter, that it was an attempt on the part of that man to invade the domestic management of his family.

Mr. MASON. Does not the honorable Senator think I would have some cause to complain, if the person who held the $100,000 in trust applied it to some purpose, other than the trust for which it was committed to him?

Mr. BADGER. If the Senator had waited patiently, I intended to say a word on that subject in a moment. I am taking the Senator's objection as he urged it. I am taking it upon the ground that it would be an invasion of his domestic arrangements, of the police management of his concerns. I say, in answer to the question he put to me, that it would involve no such an invasion of the regulation of his family whether the party held it as a trust for other purposes or not. If he held it as a trust for other purposes, it would be a violation of duty to apply it to any other than the purpose specified in the trust; but it would involve no attempt to control the conduct, or invade the privileges, or rule the family, or direct the administration of the concerns of the individual to whom he offered it, if he was at perfect liberty to refuse it.

My honorable friend from Virginia, who spoke last, [Mr. HUNTER,] undertook to make consistent, with the proposition he lays down, as to the power of giving those lands for purposes of charity, the uniform and established course of the Government to give them to new States for purposes of education, by this reason, that the new States are prohibited from taxing the property of the Government of the United States, the lands belonging to the Government, situated within their bounds. Suppose they do; if the Government has not a constitutional power to apply the land to purposes of education or charity, can that power be conferred or acquired, because she prohibits the State from taxing her lands?

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator allow me a single word to explain my views in regard to that matter? My idea is, that the United States contributes the school sections as a land-owner. The Government stands in two relations to the new States. One is, as the General Government, under which it has no such power, the other is as a land-holder, in which it is morally bound to contribute its quota and proportion to the general interests of the State.

Mr. BADGER. Suppose it be so. If she so contribute them as a land-owner, what right has she to tie them up to the purpose of education? If she owes them to a State as a consideration for her proprietary interest, which is untaxed, how does she gain the right to apply them to a college, to a common school, or to anything else? Upon that principle she stands in the attitude of a debtor, and should pay the money to the creditor, to be applied as the creditor thinks proper. Where does she get the constitutional power in the one case more than the other? I admit the honorable Senator assigns very good reasons why the power should be exercised, if she possesses it; but, undoubtedly, the fact which he states confers no power that does not exist independent of it.

Now, Mr. President, another word. It is said that these are donations of public lands, and that we cannot make a donation of them. How do the gentlemen reconcile that proposition with the donations which we every day make to the new States? We make them for the purpose of enabling them to construct canals and railroads, and to prosecute other purposes of internal improvement. Sir, I have heard it said twenty times in the Senate that these were not donations; that the United States, by giving the alternate sections, doubled the value of the sections which remained to the United States. I admit that; I admit that is a good reason for making the donations; but does it alter the character of the transaction? Is it not a donation, if a man, having two adjoining lots, makes a present of one of them to me, from the calculation that my improving it will make the remaining one twice as valuable to him? That may be the fact which influences him as a prudent man in making it; but I put it to you, am I not still the donee of the lot which he gives me? I pay nothing for it. I take it, and use it for my own purposes. Whatever the lot is worth, it is a free gift to me. The motive which induces the proprietor of both to give one is a very sensible motive, that, by making the present of one, the donee will apply it for his own purpose in such a way as to increase the value of the residuary lot; but it is a donation. Whatever I receive from another man, to apply to my own purposes, and for which I pay him nothing in money or in money's worth, is a donation, else it is impossible for me to understand what a donation is. So that if the reason upon which this bill is objected to is sustained, we must reverse our course with regard to all grants. We must maintain that we have no power to give lands to the new States for railroad purposes; that we have no right to give the alternate sections for the purpose of promoting the improvement of the States in which they lie; and, so far as I see, we must surrender the power to make donations to actual settlers; we must inexorably, and in every instance, require money to be paid when we dispose of the lands.

I agree with the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] I consider that the appeal that this measure makes to the heart of every Senator is entitled to every worthy and high consideration. It is the motive to me to vote for the bill. It gives no power in itself. The motive to give the alternate sections confers no constitutional power to grant lands for railroads; nor does the motive to give preemption rights to actual settlers confer any constitutional power; nor does the motive to give lands for the purposes of education confer any constitutional power.

But the constitutional power exists; and the several motives of a measure constitute the reason for exercising it. It is strange, when we have heard, time and again here, that these lands are held by the General Government as the trustee for the States; when we have been told so often, in very glowing terms, that they have been procured by shedding the common blood, or they have been purchased by applying the common treasure; that we are then also told that it is utterly unconstitutional in the trustee to use a portion of the lands which he holds for the benefit of those for whom he holds them.

I really think that the honorable Senator from Virginia must review the ground upon which he makes opposition to the bill. It may be wrong; but I feel a strong conviction upon my mind, that if it be wrong, he has not assigned the proper reason for it.

Mr. BROWN. I desire, before the vote is taken upon the question, to say a few words; to occupy five or ten minutes of the time of the Senate. Not having an opportunity to do so now without obstructing the regular order of business, I move the postponement of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. GWIN. I should like to move as an amendment, that the bill, as it has been amended, be printed, so that we can understand what it is.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair does not regard that as a proper amendment to the motion. By unanimous consent, it will be ordered to be printed.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. CLAYTON spoke for two hours and a quarter without concluding.

Mr. EVERETT. The Senator from Delaware is evidently very much exhausted; and I therefore move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to say that—

Mr. CLAYTON. If there is the slightest opposition to the motion, I will endeavor to go on.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should be glad to yield, if—

Mr. CLAYTON. I will go on at once, it being understood that the Senator objects.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw the motion to postpone?

Mr. EVERETT. I do, at the instance of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President—

Mr. BAYARD. I hope my colleague will not persist in speaking to-day. I think it but an act of justice that he should be accommodated. I therefore renew the motion to postpone.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WISCONSIN RAILROAD GRANT.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the bill making a grant of land to the State of Wisconsin, to aid in the construction of a railroad and branch road in said State, upon which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RUSSELL. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RUSSELL. Is it not in order for the Committee on Printing to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. That is the rule of the House. The gentleman may make his report from the Committee on Printing at any time when he can get the floor for that purpose, but he cannot take the floor from a member for that purpose.

Mr. DISNEY. When I took the floor on yesterday it was my intention to have gone into an extended argument upon the constitutional power of Congress to make grants of the character of those contained in this bill, and also to vindicate the policy upon the part of Congress in making such grants. But I am importuned too much by gentlemen around me, on every hand, to bring this debate to a close at a very early hour, and advised as I am, that the Committee of Ways and Means are anxious to proceed to the consideration of the deficiency bill in committee, I am disposed to yield, so far as my own wishes are concerned.

I was disposed to give the House an opportunity for a general examination and discussion of the merits of the bill, so far as gentlemen might wish to enter into such a discussion. I should like to have it, with regard to this bill, in every possible shape in which the question of the general policy of Congress in granting lands to the States to aid in the construction of railroads can be presented. But I repeat that, importuned as I am on every hand to close this debate, I shall yield to it, and shall confine my remarks to one or two brief observations.

First, I desire to say a word or two with regard to an objection which has been raised, that the road for which this grant is made will come in competition with one or two other roads. Now, in order to do away with all excuse for making such an objection, I propose to modify the pending amendment by substituting the proposition which I send to the Chair.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That the grant herein provided for shall not be construed to extend to any land upon the line of said road between the town of Madison and the southern boundary of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. DISNEY proceeded: The effect of the amendment, as now modified, would be to make a direct and specific provision in the bill excluding the State from the benefit of granted land upon the line of the road south and east of the town of Madison; and obviates, by direct provision, the objection made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUTTING] yesterday.

The objection, as I said yesterday, from the circumstance that no public land exists south and east of the town of Madison, has no existence, in point of fact. But the friends of the bill are willing that this modification of the amendment shall be made, and I therefore move it.

Mr. Speaker, the whole question—the whole matter to be examined with regard to the character of these railroad grants—resolves itself into these two points, and they are the only questions that can arise out of them: one is as to the competency of Congress to make such grants; and the other, and the only other before the House, is the policy or expediency of making such grants.

The other day, when this matter was under consideration, I called the attention of the House to the opinions of Mr. Calhoun, who is universally regarded as good authority by members of this House upon questions of this kind, at least by those who hold to a rigid construction of the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must arrest the gentleman from Ohio in his remarks for a moment, for the purpose of calling his attention to the amendment he proposes. The motion pending is to commit the bill; no amendment is therefore in order except by the unanimous consent of the House. The Chair desires to have the understanding of the House upon it.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. DISNEY. I merely suggested the modification. I am not at all strenuous upon its adoption.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have no objection to the modification going with the original amendment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DISNEY. I suppose the gentleman would not have any objection to such a course.

Mr. JONES. None at all.

Mr. DISNEY. But I have.

The SPEAKER. Objection has been made, and the amendment cannot be received.

Mr. DISNEY. Very well; I do not desire to press the amendment; I merely offered it to gratify the friends of the bill.

But, sir, to proceed. When last up, I called the attention of the House to the opinions of Mr. Calhoun in regard to the competency of Congress to make grants such as are proposed in the pending bill. With the permission of the House, I will read some further extracts from his report in 1846 upon this subject. He says:

"Your committee will next proceed to consider that portion of the memorial which relates to the communication by railroads between the valley of the Mississippi and the southern Atlantic States. They regard works of the kind as belonging to internal improvements, (that is, improvements within the body of the States,) and as such, are, in their opinion, not embraced in the power to regulate commerce. But they are, nevertheless, of the opinion that where such roads, or other works of internal improvements, may pass through public lands, the United States may contribute to their construction, in their character of proprietors, to the extent that they may be enhanced in price thereby. This has usually been done by ceding alternate sections on the projected line of such works; and it is believed that no mode of contributing more fair or better calculated to guard against abuses can be devised. That Congress has a right to make such contributions, where there is reasonable ground to believe that the public lands will be enhanced in proportion, under its right to dispose of the 'territory and other public property of the United States,' your committee cannot doubt. In making this assertion, they hold to the rule of strict construction, and that this power, like all the other powers of the Government, is a trust power, and, as such, is strictly limited by the nature and object of the trust. In this case the rule requires that the lands, and other public property of the United States, should be disposed of to the best advantage; and where that can be done by contributing a portion to works which would make the residue equally or more valuable than the whole would be without it, as is supposed, they hold it would be strictly within the rule. Your committee go further. They are of the opinion, not only that Congress has the right to contribute to the extent stated in such cases, but that it is in duty bound to do so, as the representative of a part of the proprietors of the land to be benefited. It would be neither just nor fair for it to stand by and realize the advantage they would derive from the work, without contributing a due proportion towards its construction. It would be still less justifiable to refuse to contribute, if its effects should be to defeat a work, the construction of which, while it would enhance the value of the land belonging to the public, and that of individual proprietors, would promote the prosperity of the country generally."

Thus emphatic, clear, and distinct is Mr. Calhoun with regard to the competency of Congress to make grants of the sort now proposed, holding that it is not only competent for Congress to make such grants, but that it is their bounden duty to do it in every case where a grant of the kind would enhance the value of the residue of the public domain in the vicinity of such donations. His reasoning is sound, but we need not invoke the authority of Mr. Calhoun in support of a proposition so clear and well-established as this proposition is, for it has been coeval with the history of our public domain. A right of this kind upon the part of Congress has ever been asserted. The very first act that provided for the survey of the public domain made grants of sections sixteen for school purposes, and of sections twenty-nine for ministerial purposes, making specific grants of those sections for the purposes indicated, in order to induce purchasers to buy the surrounding and adjacent lands.

In the same class are all the grants in regard to saline lands; and it has ever been held, and truly held, that in making those grants the Government was compensated by the sale of the adjacent lands for the lands given and donated—a most comprehensive principle, which is recognized in private life, and acted upon by every man who lays out a tract of land as a town or city; he lays it off into streets, lanes, and alleys, dedicating a lot here for a market-house, and a lot there for a court-house, and the doctrine of the law is, that though he may have dedicated those lots for public purposes, yet he has been paid for them in the sales made to the purchasers of the adjacent and surrounding ground. So in the case of the man who lays off a street, and sells the lands abutting on it on either side, the donation of the street itself is no loss to the party, because he receives compensation for it in the enhanced price of the adjacent lots.

This doctrine is recognized by your courts of law. It is the doctrine acted on, as I have said, by individuals in their own private transactions. I repeat it, that the power of making grants, and donating portions of the public domain, in order to induce purchasers to buy the adjacent land has been acted upon by this Government ever since it had public land.

One word in regard to the policy of it, and I shall have done. The policy of this sort of grants is evident in its effect not only on the interests of the country where the land is located, but also on the Treasury of the United States. The peculiar benefit of it is shown by the report of your Commissioner of the General Land Office in regard to the grants heretofore made by Congress. As a matter of policy, it is recommended to you and indorsed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It is indorsed to you by the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior. It is recommended to you by the President himself, in his message to Congress at the commencement of the present session. It is indorsed by the Administration generally; and, independent of that, I repeat that an examination of the facts themselves must induce every man to believe that the Treasury of the Union will be benefited by the grant, while the immediate neighborhood of the land granted will also be peculiarly interested and benefited. In this case, as I said before, these roads run through vast tracts of the public domain, as yet uninhabited by citizens of the country. By their construction, the land will be cultivated and settled. The resources of the country will be developed, and at once add to the general strength and power of the Government.

I have but one single consideration further. The western road, if constructed, will make a direct route from the northern and eastern States to the Territory of Minnesota. It makes that vast and fertile Territory easy of access to all the emigrants from the northern and eastern portions of the Union. The other road connected with the head of Lake Superior opens up communication with the rich resources of that region and the Atlantic coast. With these general remarks I call for the previous question.

Mr. EASTMAN. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw the call for the previous question for a moment. If he will do so I will pledge myself to renew it.

Mr. DISNEY. On that condition I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. EASTMAN. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that this question would have been decided without the necessity on my part of saying a single word. I live at a remote distance from the lines of these conflicting railroads. My immediate constituents have no more interest in the one than they have in the other. Residing in the extreme southwest corner county of Wisconsin, I am not interested, directly or indirectly, in either of these projects; and I think if any person can speak disinterestedly upon this question, can look on the question of railroads and their conflicting interests throughout the State with impartiality, I am that person. I have foreborne making any remarks on this question, have not interfered, being willing that the interests of both of the roads should be heard. I shall acquiesce in the decision of the House, whatever it may be.

The Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company have been here, and have procured the passage of a bill donating a part of the public domain for the purpose of completing their road from Madison to Prairie du Chien, a distance of seventy or eighty miles. That bill came into the House from the Senate yesterday and was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. With these remarks I will proceed to state, as I understand the conflicting interests involved, the question between them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin permit me to make a remark?

Mr. EASTMAN. I cannot consent; I beg not to be interrupted.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I desire to make an observation on is a question of fact.

Mr. EASTMAN. Well; I hope I will be able to satisfy the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIMMONS] about all the question of facts. And if not, then, when I have concluded, it will not be too late for him to make his statement.

Several years ago, Mr. Speaker, the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin chartered the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company. I believe, however, that the Rock River and Union Valley Railroad Company was chartered a short time before the chartering of the Milwaukee and Mississippi company. The town of Janesville, and the people of the county of Rock, being in the interior of the State, had, as was supposed, some rights as well as the people of the city of Milwaukee.

Milwaukee, it will be borne in mind, is the large commercial emporium of the State of Wisconsin. We of the interior—the people of the western and of the northern portions of the State—had paid tribute to that great city. It sprung up, as it were, in a day, as if by magic. We sent to it our lead, our wheat, our corn, to be exported. They had the advantage from our trade of commission and storage, and everything of that kind. We gave them the whole benefit of our trade. We then asked the Milwaukee and Mississippi company that the road should be run in such a direction that the line would accommodate the people of the lower part of the State. We applied to them to that intent. But, having waxed fat, the company kicked. They said they would not run the road through Janesville, or the county of Rock, or give the people of that part of the State any advantage from it; but that it should run to a point near White Water, to a town north of the Lake Koshkanong; and from that point west to Madison. The effect of this was to cut off the county of Rock and the south part of the State almost entirely. The county of Rock was at that time the garden of the State. It produced as much wheat and corn, and other products of the soil, as any other county in the State, according to its population.

However, when the people of Rock county saw that they could not expect to derive any benefit or favor from the Milwaukee and Mississippi railroad, they went to work to build a railroad for themselves. A company was organized, stock was taken, and some progress was made to carry on the work. At that time the people of Milwaukee, and those who were interested in the Milwaukee and Mississippi railroad, saw that they were going against their own interests, and they then consented that the road should run south to the town of Milton, about nine miles from the city of Janesville. I hold in my hand a map of the Milwaukee and Mississippi railroad, from which I take these distances. After E. H. Brodhead, the chief engineer, was elected superintendent of that road, they consented to build a branch to Janesville. That branch has been completed. They cannot, however, go direct from Janesville to Madison, and thus on to Prairie du Chien, without going back to Milton, a distance of nine miles, and thus through Stoughton to Madison.

The Rock River Union Valley Railroad Company contemplated running their road from Chicago to Janesville, and from Janesville to Madison. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CUTTING] told us yesterday that, from certain information which he had received—there is a good deal of this sort of information without the walls of Congress, from some people who come to oppose this grant—he believed the roads run parallel for a considerable distance, as he thought, from forty to sixty miles.

I am happy, Mr. Speaker, to have an opportunity to correct the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CUTTING.] He is in error. He states his high authority to be the president of the Milwaukee and Mississippi railroad, the mayor of the city of Milwaukee, and divers other individuals, and also quotes a Senator in the other end of the Capitol, as saying that he was in error "in regard to the route which was proposed by this bill." Now it seems to me that it would have been highly proper to have inquired of the Senator upon that point, and not undertake in this House to say what the Senator had said upon hearsay.

I know the gentleman from New York does not wish to injure this scheme wantonly; that he does not wish, in this indefinite way, to wrong us; but I think he ought to have inquired of the Senator in reference to this matter, and thereby make himself sure in his statement of facts. And, furthermore, it seems to me that if that Senator had come to that conclusion, he would at least have spoken to me about it, for I am on the best terms with him; but I have not heard one single word in relation to the error alluded to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUTTING] yesterday.

But I can understand why this opposition comes from the city of Milwaukee. It desires to continue, as heretofore, to be the great commercial point of the State; and that all the interests of the State should be centered in that city. But I hold in my hand a resolution which has been sent to me by the Common Council of the city of Milwaukee showing—what? Not that the city does not desire a grant of land for the construction of railroads; but it asks its Senators in Congress, and the members of the House of Representatives from that State to procure, if possible, a grant of land to construct a road from Lake Superior, by the lake shore, through Milwaukee, to the city of Chicago; thus compelling us who live in the interior, the western, and the northern parts of the State to pay tribute, not exactly to Cæsar, but to the city of Milwaukee.

I have also a series of resolutions which passed the Board of Trade of that city, asking more donations of land; and are men to come here, with high-sounding names of presidents of railroads and mayors of cities, and all that sort of thing, and intimate that the people of the State are averse to any donation of lands for these purposes?

But these roads do not run parallel to the extent which the gentleman from New York supposes they do. They run no nearer than five miles at any one point, and at that distance only for about eighteen miles from the village of Stoughton to the city of Madison. There the roads diverge again, and one goes in one direction to Lake Superior, and the other to the northwest, penetrating the pineries of the North, and into the vast mineral regions of Lake Superior. And because it does not happen to go through the city of Milwaukee this road has met all this opposition. I state, as I before remarked, that the object of it is not against land grants, but it is to make all such grants tributary to the city of Milwaukee.

Sir, I have some interest in Milwaukee myself, but I have no interest in the grant asked for here. But I cannot see, with the eyes of gentlemen from Milwaukee, that it is to militate against their prosperity at all. I say, if Milwaukee is not to be benefited by this road it is not the fault of the road, but because they have built the city in the wrong place. We cannot make roads to benefit every town, and we cannot afford to let our produce lay in Milwaukee five or six months every year ice bound, and pay storage and commissions thereon merely for the benefit of that city.

With these remarks I will redeem my pledge to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] and I ask for the previous question.

Mr. CUTTING. I rise to a privileged question. When the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. EASTMAN] undertakes to charge members with the duty of dogging Senators, instead of allowing them to ask a question of the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, and seems to suppose that I have been guilty of some offense in propounding a single question for the information of this House, I think he ought not to spring the previous question in such a way as to prevent an answer to his remarks.

Mr. EASTMAN. I made a pledge to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] that I would renew the previous question. I would be happy to gratify the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUTTING] under any other circumstances.

Mr. HUNT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUTTING] to make an explanation.

Objection was made.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope this motion for the previous question will be withdrawn, in order that the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands may redeem the solemn pledge made to the House the other day.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. LETCHER. It is proper that he should be heard.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I presume that the gentleman from Wisconsin is only redeeming the pledge he has made to the chairman of the committee. If the chairman will consent to the withdrawal of the previous question, of course the gentleman from Wisconsin will consent to it, and I do hope that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] will accord with the request.

Mr. DISNEY. All I have to say is, that I think no gentleman upon this floor will find any fault as to any illiberality shown by myself in the discussion of this question. In making my remarks, yesterday, I yielded and yielded the floor to gentlemen who were continually interrupting me, so that I was deprived of all opportunity of discussing the question.

Upon the demand for the previous question, a division being had, there were—ayes 59, noes 86.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. LETCHER obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] will yield the floor, I will move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LETCHER. If I yield the floor to enable the gentleman from Tennessee to make that motion, will I be entitled to the floor in the morning?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia would be entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES. I then make the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. The House having refused to sustain the demand for the previous question, the subject must lie over one day. It is absurd, after the House has refused to second the demand for the previous question, to go on with the consideration and discussion of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The practice of the House is, that if the House refuse to order the main question, the subject must go over one day; but, failing to second the demand for the previous question, leaves the subject under consideration where it was before the demand was made. The question is upon the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAMILTON. I rise to a question of order. I want to know how the floor has been taken from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER?]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia yielded the floor to another gentleman for the purpose of making the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 52, a further count not being demanded.

So the House refused to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. DISNEY. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know if the gentleman from Virginia did not speak upon this question on Thursday last, when he objected to my occupying the floor?

Mr. LETCHER. I do not reckon he did.

Mr. DISNEY. Well, sir, I do reckon he did. [Laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. Then I appeal to the Chair to decide between us. There was another question under consideration the other day in relation to which a motion had been made to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I then made some reference to this railroad bill, and the gentleman from Ohio called me to order. Does the gentleman recollect that?

Mr. DISNEY. I do.

Mr. LETCHER. And the gentleman told me that I should have a fair chance to discuss this bill before the vote was taken.

Mr. DISNEY. I ask that the Chair shall decide the question whether the gentleman from Virginia is entitled to the floor? My recollection, and that of other members of the House is, that the gentleman has spoken once upon this subject, and is, therefore, not entitled to the floor. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to his going on, but I ask the Chair to decide the question.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Virginia had spoken once upon the question pending he would be entitled to the floor if no other gentleman desired to speak. The gentleman from Ohio cannot claim it for himself because he has certainly spoken once upon the question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] has not already spoken twice upon this question?

The SPEAKER. Not on the motion to commit.

Mr. JONES. Then he is still entitled to another hour?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled, under the rule, to close debate upon the bill.

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the policy which has been adopted with regard to this bill, indicates very clearly to the House the necessity for a thorough examination of all the measures of this character which are presented for our consideration. It seems to me that this policy proves conclusively the propriety of referring all such measures to a Committee of the Whole House, where an opportunity may be given for discussion and investigation in regard to their merits.

Now, sir, here is a proposition which has been brought into this House, and without giving any member an opportunity of examining into its details, or the principles involved, a motion to stop debate is made by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, [Mr. DISNEY,] after a speech from himself, and after another speech from a member who is interested in this road. After two speeches upon one side, and none upon the other, an attempt is made to gag everybody who is opposed to it, and rush it through the House under the operation of the previous question.

Sir, if this proposition had merits; if its various provisions could bear the test of careful examination; if the considerations which were alluded to by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WELLS] on yesterday, could bear the light for a single moment, would such a course as this have been adopted? I was struck with the avowal made upon this floor yesterday, by the gentleman from Wisconsin sin. I do not know what part of the State he comes from—

A MEMBER. From Milwaukee.

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, from Milwaukee. He told us that he was opposed to this bill; that he had opposed it in committee, but that he intended to wait, under an understanding with his colleagues here, to see whether a contract was to be executed. What contract? What contract has been made between these parties? What is the understanding alluded to, by which the vote of a member upon a proposition he disapproves of, is so influenced that it may be cast in favor of it, provided other parties will do something as an equivalent?

Mr. EASTMAN. I feel it my duty to interrupt the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield the floor?

Mr. LETCHER. Oh, certainly. I shall not practice on him what he wanted to practice on me.

Mr. EASTMAN. I desire to correct a statement of fact, and to set the gentleman right as he goes along. I did not understand my colleague as saying what the gentleman has put into his mouth; and with the leave of the House, I will read what he did say. Mr. WELLS said:

"The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] has called upon me to say whether I acquiesce in this measure. I would reply that I have been opposed to it. I opposed it before the committee. I have no hesitation in saying that it is generally considered as unfavorable to the Milwaukee and Lake Shore interests. The bill, having passed the Senate, came to the House. The majority of the committee were in favor of it. The rest of the delegation from Wisconsin were known to advocate its passage; and I had concluded not to make open opposition to it on this floor, with the understanding that my colleague would also remain silent, and that we should leave the House to pass upon its merits, after both sides had been fairly presented by those not immediately interested. I have adopted this course, too, in the hope that it would secure a favorable consideration to other bills, which would directly benefit the interests which I more immediately represent.

That is what he did say.

A MEMBER. Ah! but there was something more after that.

Mr. LETCHER. Wait a moment, and I will read it for the gentleman.

Mr. EASTMAN. Yes, he went on further to say, in answer to a question whether he would vote for the bill:

"I suppose I have the right to answer affirmatively, or negatively, or neither. In the present condition of things, I prefer not to answer at all, but to wait the further action of the House."

Now, where is the contract that the gentleman alluded to? As for me, I know of no contract. I have made no contract. I state, as I stated before, that I live in a remote part of the State. I am as favorable to one railroad as I am to another; to the Milwaukee and Mississippi road as I am to this, and to this as I am to that; but what I say is, that one should not be passed at the expense of the other. I have made no contract. I am above contracts. I am not to be bought.

Mr. LETCHER. Here is what the gentleman omitted to read:

"Mr. DISNEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether he intends to vote for the bill now under consideration?"

"Mr. WELLS. I have some question about it."

Why had Mr. WELLS "some question" about it? Had not he already acknowledged that he was opposed to the bill? So great was his opposition to it, that he even went before the committee and manifested his opposition to it by seeking to defeat its introduction into this House by its passage through that committee. What, then, is it that induces him to announce to this House that he has "some question about it?" Is it the mere fact that he and the other gentleman from Wisconsin had agreed that neither should say anything? And, by the way, with that agreement, how comes it that he [Mr. EASTMAN] makes a speech to-day in favor of the bill, and then moves the previous question? How can that be explained?

Mr. EASTMAN. I apprehend that there is more than one gentleman from Wisconsin. Does he allude to me?

Mr. LETCHER. There are three here. I take it the gentleman on the other side of the House is in for it rather deeper than you are, from all I can see. [Laughter.]

But, sir, the gentleman over the way tells us that there is nothing in this bill which is calculated to conflict with the interests already created by legislative acts in the State of Wisconsin in the establishment of other roads. Now, I shall endeavor to satisfy the House, from a map which I have before me, that there is a direct and positive conflict; and that if Congress shall step in and pass this bill in the shape in which it has been introduced into this House, it will lend itself to the accomplishment of a destruction of the private rights and the pecuniary interests of various individuals on the line of the Milwaukee and Madison road, which have been embarked in that scheme. What is it they propose to do? Under this bill they propose to grant lands to a railroad which is called the Rock River and Union Valley railroad, that commences at Chicago and runs northwest to the town of Janesville. Then, sir, it runs northeast to Fond du Lac. Then it runs nearly in a north direction for some twenty miles. Then it runs in rather a northwesterly direction, somewhat zigzag, to the point on Lake Superior.

Why is it, I ask, when a road is projected, (the Mississippi and Lake Shore Railroad,) from the town of Chicago direct to Fond du Lac, a distance of one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty miles, that they are seeking by this road to establish another between the same points by running around through the interior so as to avoid the harbors and the cities located on the lake shore? In our country, and I imagine even in the State of Ohio, in which the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands lives, there is a feeling of State pride. There is an anxious desire on the part even of the gentleman himself to build up Cincinnati as the great commercial, the great business point, the chief city for the State of Ohio. You would never find him here making a war on a city within the limits of his own State for the purpose of carrying the trade out of it over to Louisville, in the State of my friend who sits near me, [Mr. PRESTON.] Yet we have this anomaly here. Here are two representatives of Wisconsin on this floor warring on Milwaukee and the other cities of their own State, situated on the lake shore, for the purpose of building up Chicago, in the State of Illinois.

What is the interest of this Government? Is it not to make connections between the harbors on the lakes and the back country? Should not that be the great object it should have in view? Is it not the great interest with the Government itself, in the event of difficulty or foreign troubles, to have its connections with its own harbors, so that it can transport whatever is to be sent to those points into the interior of the country? But the Government here is asked not to adopt that policy, but to disregard it, and to go for the establishment of another road, which runs some sixty miles at one point from the lake shore, and thirty miles at another point from the same lake shore. Now, will any gentleman tell me that it is the interest of this Government to make appropriations of that sort?

But let me test these gentlemen still further. They say that there is no conflict by this scheme with the private interests of those who have embarked their means in the construction of this Milwaukee and Madison railroad on the farms of those living along the line of it. Mortgages, as I understand, are now subsisting. The only hope for the redemption of these mortgages, and the relief of the land-holders, is by the profits which they anticipate upon the completion of the Milwaukee and Madison road. From Janesville to Madison is about fifty or sixty miles, and the proposed road runs nearly parallel with the line of the Milwaukee and Madison railroad. Twelve miles is the furthest point that those lines are apart; so that there will be an average distance between them of something like six miles.

Mr. EASTMAN. The distance to Madison from the point indicated is not fifty or sixty miles. It is not above thirty.

Mr. LETCHER. Then the scale of the map must be wrong.

Mr. EASTMAN. At most it is not over forty miles from Janesville to Madison. If the gentleman will deduct twelve from forty, how will he make the distance fifty or sixty? If he wants to make it that distance, he must lengthen the route.

Mr. LETCHER. Here then is a conflict of interests. Here is the Government asked to furnish lands to this Rock River Union Valley Railroad Company for the purpose of enabling them to make a parallel line from Janesville to the town of Madison; and yet gentlemen say that it cannot produce any conflict of interest; that it will do no harm to the Madison and Milwaukee railroad. I put it to the common sense of every gentleman in this House, if there is even a show of plausibility in such a statement?

Mr. DISNEY. Has not the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] yet learned that I have this morning offered an amendment to the bill, which specially and specifically provides that this road shall not obtain one acre of land from the Government on the line of the road between the town of Madison and the southern boundary of the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. LETCHER. One thing at a time. If the gentleman [Mr. DISNEY] will have patience, I will soon get to that amendment, and show that, as the gentleman himself says, it is no great affair after all.

Now, sir, I think I have shown that there is a conflict of interest. Then there is another consideration. There is not a foot of public land, as I am informed, in the city of Chicago, in Illinois, where this road commences, until you get beyond Madison, a distance of perhaps one hundred and fifty or sixty miles.

Then take the other line of the proposed road. There are no public lands till you get twenty miles above Fond du Lac. So, here they are running a road for one hundred and ninety miles in one direction to that point, and one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty miles in another direction, through a country where there is not a foot of public lands; and yet the gentleman over the way offers an amendment which he thinks meets exactly that state of the case.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States, by the hands of SYDNEY WEBSTER, Esq., his Private Secretary, informing the House that he had signed certain bills and joint resolutions.]

Mr. LETCHER. I understand that this Rock River Union Valley Railroad Company, like a great many other railroad companies scattered throughout the country, is in a dilapidated condition. It is thought by most people to be approaching a state of insolvency; and I have heard it intimated that even the iron which had been bought for this Rock River Union Valley Railroad was actually sold to raise the means to help those gentlemen who are employed to manage the matter and secure the passage of the bill through this House. What is the meaning of this proposition, offered under these circumstances, by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands? Here it is:

"Provided that the road herein provided for shall not be construed to extend to any land on the line of said road between the town of Madison and the southern boundary of the State of Wisconsin."

Or, in other words, between the town of Madison and the city of Chicago. That is the beginning point.

Now, suppose you give them the land above Madison on one line, and above Fond du Lac on the other line. Could they not, if the concern is insolvent, as it is said, raise the wind by a pledge of the lands as security, and apply the money to make the road? Does the amendment provide against anything of that sort? Not at all. But if the gentleman [Mr. DISNEY] had said here that he proposed to amend the bill by requiring that the road should start at Fond du Lac, or twenty miles above it, where the public lands begin, and that land should be donated for six miles on either side of the road, or for fifteen miles in the contingency stated, and should be applied to the construction of the road from that point to its terminus at Lake Superior, and that the lands so granted should not be pledged in any way, nor any of the proceeds arising therefrom used to aid in constructing the line between Madison and Janesville, or the line between Fond du Lac and Chicago. But, sir, the object of this bill is to revive the credit of this company, and thus enable it to break down private interests, and subject those interested in the Madison and Milwaukee railroad to serious pecuniary loss.

Mr. DISNEY, (interrupting.) I wish to inquire of the gentleman if he ever read a very celebrated chapter in one of Fielding's novels, in which the author undertakes to show that a man can write the better for knowing something of the subject upon which he attempts to write? It is very interesting.

Apapods, has the gentleman from Virginia read

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 33.

the bill upon which he is commenting? I am sure he has not; for let me say to him, that under the provisions of that bill, and by the construction given by the Land Office to similar provisions in other bills, the road can obtain no land except such as lie alongside of the road proposed to be constructed; or, to use the language of the Land Office, they cannot go to one point of the State and select lands with which to construct and build a road between other points.

Now, under these facts, what becomes of all the talk of the gentleman in reference to raising the wind to build a road below the town of Madison?

Mr. LETCHER. I like to see this restlessness on the part of the friends of this bill. It seems to me to indicate that there is a "good time coming," [laughter,] and that we shall find them hereafter, at least, advocating a little more consideration for bills of this sort than they have hitherto been willing to allow to them.

It seems quite unfortunate that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] either did not hear me, or did not understand my point. It therefore occurs to me that he might have read the essay to which he alludes with advantage. It might be of some service to him to listen to my remarks before he undertakes to reply. Now, did I say anything about the Governor, or the President, or the Commissioner of the Land Office, or anybody else, deciding how these lands were to be assigned? Not at all. But I take the ground that the public lands, beginning at Fond du Lac, and extending to Lake Superior, are the lands out of which the company must procure their alternate sections. And cannot the company pledge that land as security for loans, and apply the money so raised to the building of the road below? What is to prohibit them from doing so under this law? Suppose they do it. Cannot the twenty miles begin at Chicago as well as anywhere else; and cannot they make the twenty miles anywhere they please along the line? Certainly they may.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing which will settle the matter. I put the question to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] whether the company is not upon its last legs? [Laughter.] The gentleman's answer will, I have no doubt, settle the question.

Mr. DISNEY. I respond again, that this grant is to the State of Wisconsin, and not to that or any other company. The State of Wisconsin will have the control of this grant for the purposes indicated by the bill—for the construction of a road between the points indicated; and whether that company be upon its last or its first legs, is a matter of no sort of importance to this Congress, because the grant is made for a specific purpose—the construction of that road—and the State of Wisconsin becomes the trustee for that object.

By the provisions of that bill, as I remarked before, the proceeds of this land are to be applied to the building of the road in sections of twenty continuous miles, through the portion of country from which the lands are selected; the sales to be made as the consecutive sections are built.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman from Ohio does not answer me directly, and I take it that he dodges the question, because he does not want to say anything about the dead. [Laughter.] He does not want to acknowledge the fact that this concern is really insolvent, because if he did he might lose votes for the measure. But, says the gentleman, you do not vote money to this company, you give the land to the State by this bill. But who gets the land after it is turned over by the State to the railroad company? A few years ago we voted some land to Illinois for railroad purposes. Who got it? The Wall street brokers got it, if I have read the history of that road aright. Do they not hold it now, and have they not absolute control of it?

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman allow me to answer his question? The Wall street brokers do not hold this land.

Mr. LETCHER. I have a pamphlet here, which will show the history of this matter. We gave land to the State of Illinois for the purpose of building the Central Road to Chicago, and a branch running to Galena. Who comprised the members of this company? We are aware of the fact, that Mr. Rantoul, a member of this House of the last Congress, was one of the parties concerned in this road. How did this gentleman, living in the State of Massachusetts, become interested in it? Who are the other parties mentioned in the act incorporating this company? Their names, in the first section of "An act to incorporate the Illinois Central Railroad Company," are recorded as follows:

Robert Schuyler, George Griswold, Gouverneur Morris, Franklin Haven, David A. Neal, Robert Rantoul, junior, Jonathan Sturgis, George W. Ludlow, John F. A. Sanford, Henry Grinnel, William H. Aspinwall, Leroy Wiley, and Joseph W. Alsop, and all such persons as shall hereafter become stockholders in the company hereby incorporated," &c.

Where do all these gentleman live? Do they live in Illinois?

Mr. BISSELL. I will answer the gentleman. They do not live in the State of Illinois—

Mr. LETCHER. Then you are sold out? [Laughter.]

Mr. BISSELL. The gentleman from Virginia seems very unwilling to hear answers to his own questions. These gentlemen do not live in the State of Illinois, nor have they got control of these lands at all. Is the gentleman answered now? The lands are in the hands of, and are solely in the charge of, trustees.

Mr. LETCHER. Trustees! Who get the proceeds of these lands? Who compose the company that furnish the means to make the road? Whose property is exempt from taxation for six years?

Mr. BISSELL. The company will furnish $17,000,000 to build the road. The State receives what is equivalent to fourteen per cent. of the net proceeds from the time the road is completed. When all the terms and conditions are complied with, then these lands are to be sold for the benefit of the company, and to the payment of the money which they borrowed to build the road with. The lands are in charge of trustees, and under the control of a company, one of them being the Governor of the State of Illinois.

Mr. LETCHER. I have shown you who comprise the company organized for the construction of this road. The gentleman from Illinois says that trustees are the parties who are to manage it. Who are they to manage it for, but these New Yorkers? The State of Illinois is to receive seven per cent. of the gross proceeds when the work is done, which is equal to fourteen per cent. of the net proceeds. I stated that $17,000,000 are to be furnished to build the road. If the gentleman does not acknowledge that, I can prove it by documents which I have here. The company say that they can build the road for that amount. They value the lands at $21,000,000. Who pockets the difference? What becomes of the trustees then?

Mr. BISSELL. The prospective value which they may put upon their lands may be more or less. I do not think they expect to realize a dollar from them until they have expended four or five years' labor, and $17,000,000 of their own money upon the road. When all that is done—when all this money has been expended, they will make something handsome out of it, provided they realize—which I have no idea they will—$20,000,000 out of the sales of the land, and provided the entire cost of constructing the road does not exceed $17,000,000. If this turns out to be a correct statement of the amount of receipts and expenditures, they will, in the end, make some three or four millions out of the operation.

Mr. LETCHER. Then the gentleman's explanation amounts exactly to this: These stockholders have the control of a road, according to their own showing, that will yield them a clear annual profit, after paying seven per cent. to the State, and all other expenses, of $1,774,252, and give them three or four millions besides, from the sales of the lands, beyond the whole cost of constructing the road—quite a handsome speculation for the stockholders!

Mr. DISNEY. Well, what of it?

Mr. LETCHER. I will tell the gentleman what of it. It shows exactly this: that you are asking the Federal Government not only to give land enough to make the roads, but to make a fortune for these Wall street brokers besides. That is "what of it."

Mr. YATES. I wish to say one word in reference to this proposition of donating lands to the State of Illinois to aid in the construction of the Illinois Central railroad. I can give the gentleman an answer that ought to be satisfactory to him and to the House.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the gentleman will come to the point as soon as possible.

Mr. YATES. The gentleman asks what has been done? Why, sir, we have a road seven hundred and four miles in length, of great importance to the State of Illinois, of great advantage to the people of that State, and of great national advantage; and all this without the loss of one cent to the General Government. And not only has the General Government not lost anything by it, but it has sold lands which had been for twenty-five years in the market and still remained unsold, so that it has actually placed money in the Treasury by the operation. Sir, is it nothing that we have built the longest and most magnificent railroad in the world, without the loss of a cent upon the part of the General Government?

Mr. LETCHER. Let us look for a moment at the past financial history of the State of Illinois. If I am not mistaken, before that State received the benefit of this land from the Federal Government, her financial condition was exceedingly embarrassed. She was not able to prosecute her great works of internal improvement because of the immense debt which was then resting upon her. Her bonds had depreciated to an alarming extent. But no sooner had this land been donated by the Federal Government—no sooner had the arrangements for the construction of the Central road gone into operation, than the credit of that State rose as if by magic to par, showing that it is something more than a donation for the construction of a railroad—that it is a strong support, an effectual means of restoring the credit of the State of Illinois.

But, in addition to all this, I hold that we have a written Constitution, and that it is our business to protect that written Constitution, and to carry it out fairly, according to the provisions contained within it. But nearly every member who is in favor of these railroad grants, has contended that the Federal Government ought not to be the owner of lands at all; that it ought not to be in the market selling these lands, but that they should belong to the States in which they lie. That is the argument, and that is the conclusion derived from it. Well, sir, in carrying out this system of internal improvements, which is a general system, a thorough system, so far as the new States are concerned, they accomplish all their purposes by the use of these public lands.

Sir, what are the public lands belonging to the Government but the property of the Government? What is the money of the Government but the property of the Government, occupying the same relation towards it as do the public lands? The nation's wealth consists, in part, in the money it receives from the sale of these public lands. Then can the Government give away its property in money for the construction of railroads? If not, what right has it to give away its property in these public lands, which bear the same relation to it as money itself? The Constitution now reads, "that Congress shall have power to dispose of," and so forth; but, according to the new reading approved by these gentlemen, it ought to run "that Congress shall have power to give away, and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States." That is the result of it, according to their construction, when reduced to practice. It means nothing more, and it means nothing less.

Now look at all these projected railroads to which gentlemen are urging Congress to accord lands to aid in their construction. If the railroads are of any advantage to these States, they ought to be willing at least to pay the price of the lands to the Government, and not establish a precedent here to be plead, as it has been plead by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] that Congress has done so and so heretofore, and must go on and do it hereafter.

But let me return to this Milwaukie railroad. The gentleman from Ohio tells us that the policy of the Committee on Public Lands is to equalize the grants to all these States, and to give them as much as has been granted to the State of Illinois. Now Illinois received for her Central railroad 2,593,000 acres, if my recollection is correct.

The State of Wisconsin has already received for internal improvements 949,000 and odd acres. One million six hundred thousand acres are embraced in this bill, as I understand the gentleman from Ohio. Then he tells us that the committee have agreed upon another bill making a donation of land for a road from Madison to Prairie du Chien, and that bill embraces 300,000 acres. That makes 1,900,000 acres, and with the 949,000 already received, gives 2,900,000 and odd acres; so that if this bill passes they will have received 400,000 acres more than Illinois has received. I like to be accurate about these things, and I will therefore refer to the book. I see it is set down here that the lands sold in the State of Wisconsin up to June 30, 1853, amounted to 5,045,242 acres; lands donated for schools, universities, and so forth, 1,400,728 acres; and that the lands donated for internal improvements amounted to 929,736 acres. Now, add to that the 1,900,000 acres embraced in this bill, and you then have very nearly three million acres granted to the State of Wisconsin.

Well, sir, by way of justifying this mode of disposing of the lands, the gentleman tells us that the President of the United States is for it; that the Secretary of the Interior is for it; that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is for it; and that, inasmuch as all these parties are for it, it must be conclusive of the propriety of the policy. Now, I do not hold to any such doctrine, that because a President or Secretary entertain particular opinions, that everybody else is to hold the same opinions on the same subject. I come to represent a State that entertains opinions altogether different on this question—that maintains that Congress has no right, either directly or indirectly, to appropriate the lands or money of the Federal Government to internal improvements. Here is the platform as adopted by the Democratic State Convention held in Richmond in March, 1852:

"Resolved, That Congress has no power to appropriate, directly or indirectly, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, or to grant, directly or indirectly, the public lands to the purpose of internal improvement."

I stand on that platform. I hold to that doctrine in common with the Democratic party of my State. I believe it to be sound doctrine; and so believing, I do not come here to surrender my convictions because a President of the United States, or a Secretary of the Interior, or anybody else occupying a high official position, entertains a different opinion. As to the Secretary of the Interior, I can account for this opinion to some extent. He is a man who has been living in a land State which has profited largely by this mode of disposing of the public lands. In his service in Congress he was committed to all these grants. I can ascertain very well how association, how political interest controls the opinions of men; and these influences may control his in this matter. But, by the way of satisfying the House that this policy is proper and constitutional, the gentleman from Ohio says that under the influence of it public lands have been sold, and that they are now selling, with more rapidity than public lands have been sold at any time heretofore in our history for several years past.

Mr. DISNEY. In the vicinity of these roads.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well; then, in the vicinity of these roads. How many lands have been sold? I have a statement here of the sales, to which I ask attention:

Lands sold in.....	1835.....	$15,999,804 11
	1836.....	25,167,833 06
	1837.....	7,007,523 04
	1838.....	4,905,564 64
	1839.....	6,464,556 79

Lands sold in.....	1840.....	2,789,637 53
	1841.....	1,463,364 06
	1842.....	1,417,972 06
	1843.....	2,016,044 30
	1844.....	2,207,678 04
	1845.....	2,470,303 17
	1846.....	2,904,637 27
	1847.....	3,296,404 08
	1848.....	2,621,615 26
	1849.....	1,756,890 42
From January to June 30,.....	1850.....	998,841 26
From June 30, 1850, to June 30, 1851.....		2,390,947 45
From June 30, 1851, to June 30, 1852.....		1,975,658 54

Thus we see that in 1835 and 1836 the sales were very large—amounting, in 1836, to more than $25,000,000.

Now, the gentleman says that this is owing to the policy of allowing these grants to railroads, and that the land would not have sold at all if it had not been for the grants. It is attributable to no such thing. It is attributable to the state of things which existed in the country at the time these sales were made. The whole country was then wild with the spirit of speculation. Banks were multiplying. Everything in which a speculation could be made was sought for, greedily taken up, and earnestly prosecuted; and, under the influence of that speculating spirit, these extraordinary sales of the public lands were made. Look at the state of things now. Within the last two years, I venture to say that the banking capital of the country has been doubled, or, perhaps, more than doubled, taking one State with another. I know that it has been so in my own State; and these are strong and conclusive indications of the speculating spirit which is abroad in the country at the present time. And if speculation brought about this result in 1835, 1836, and 1837, why cannot speculation bring it about in 1854. Will not the same result follow from the same cause? Then I say that it is not attributable to this policy at all. These lands would have been sold from this spirit of speculation. Do you not see, in proof of this position, that the gentlemen from these new States are warring against speculators here by amendments to the homestead bill, and in all other conceivable modes? They tell you that they do not want men to come into their country and buy up their public lands. What takes them there? Is it not the belief that they can make more money by investing in these lands than can be made by investments in other speculations? Nothing has carried them into the new States but the hope of gain.

Let me tell the gentlemen from the West one thing that will grow out of the policy pursued by them in reference to these land grants. You grant them to the State to be sure, but when so granted, the land immediately passes out of their hands into the grasp of soulless corporations. What will be the result? These corporations, invested with their great powers, are to have the benefit of all these lands and the control of all these improvements. They are to have the entire disposing of them; and the result will be, that we shall hear against them the same complaint in regard to withholding the public lands from market which has been made against the Government by gentlemen upon this floor. What restriction do they impose in regard to the sale of the lands? Do they say that they shall sell them to actual settlers, or sell them within a given time? Nothing of that sort. The result will be, then, that these corporations will become oppressive. They will war upon everything that crosses their path, in order to make the most money by the heartless abuse of the power placed in their hands, indiscreetly, as I think, by these legislative acts. And I shall be surprised if, in the course of a very few years, we do not find some of these gentlemen proclaiming a doctrine which they regarded many years ago as remarkably odious—the doctrine of charter-breaking, started by Mr. Dallas, of Pennsylvania. The burden will grow intolerable, and they will desire to get rid of it. And in order to get rid of it, they will ask a repeal of the charter, and it will have to be repealed if they get the desired relief. I shall be surprised if such is not the result. I confidently expect it; and if the burden were upon any people other than those who made the bargain, I do not know but I should clap them on the back, and applaud them for attempting to relieve themselves from it. But they have made their bed, and so let them lie.

Now, sir, in regard to this Illinois charter: I refer to it again for the purpose of showing that it is a somewhat different charter from the one which is proposed in this act; the Illinois railroad charter is for "a grant of lands to the State of Illinois for the construction of a railroad from the southern terminus of the Illinois and Michigan canal to a point at or near the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, with a branch of the same to Chicago, on Lake Michigan," &c.

Well, now, what does this bill propose? "That there be and is hereby granted to the State of Wisconsin, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from near the southern boundary of said State, east of range thirteen, by way of Janesville, in Rock county, and Fond du Lac, on Lake Winnebago, to such point on Lake Superior as may be designated under the authority of said State, and for the construction of a branch railroad from Janesville, by way of Madison," &c.

Now, why does not this road run from Chicago to its terminus on Lake Superior by the most direct line? Is it necessary to run northwest for eighty or ninety miles, and then northeast for about the same distance, and then zig-zag, and then northwest again to Lake Superior? If the road were run straight from Chicago to Lake Superior, the distance would probably be one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles less than by the proposed route.

Mr. COBB, (interrupting.) Yes; but that route is perhaps impracticable.

Mr. LETCHER. Oh, no doubt; of course it is impracticable, when the company want to make war on these lake shore towns for the benefit of Chicago. It was that which made it impracticable. There cannot be any other reason for their running the road in the manner they propose. But if that is impracticable, how do they expect to get up to the Falls of St. Croix river by the Ohio line?

Mr. COBB. To run round it.

Mr. LETCHER. Yet they propose to run one line of the Rock River Union Valley railroad to the Falls of St. Croix, and the other to the point on Lake Superior; but neither of these roads can be run in a direct line for the greater part of the distance. They can run an air-line from Janesville to Chicago, or from Janesville to Fond du Lac, where there are no public lands; but whenever they come to the public lands, they run to the best advantage for the interests of the company.

Then it is a matter which is to profit them. Then they begin to see what is to be had when they get to that point. There is nothing to be had below it; why then run by this circuitous route below Fond du Lac? They run the road in the manner pointed out from their desire to withdraw trade from the lake shore towns, that they may take it to Chicago and reap the profits of its transportation. If it comes down by the Lake Shore railroad, it passes these towns. Trade would most probably stop at some one of them. The Lake Shore railroad is now in progress, and a portion of it has been graded. Other portions have been contracted for. And yet these gentlemen tell us that this road, almost straight, and which is forty or fifty miles shorter than the road proposed, and which runs from Chicago to Fond du Lac, is of no consequence, and gravely insist upon it that Congress must make this road for their accommodation, although in so doing they seriously injured the interests of those who have invested their money in the Lake Shore road, and as seriously injure the trade of Milwaukie and the other lake shore cities and towns. Is it not asking too much?

Now, sir, I cannot understand these things. It strikes me that any man who will reflect, and who will look at the causes which regulate the conduct of men and control their actions, must come to the conclusion that there is something in this matter which demands and requires some more satisfactory explanation than has yet been given.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] yesterday referred to the acts of the General Assembly of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman [Mr. DISNEY] be kind enough to lend me the book now in his possession, and I think I can show that there is something not exactly right in regard to the act referred to. I understand that some two or three memorials passed the Legislature of Wisconsin in regard to railroads, and that under the constitution of the State of Wisconsin, the Governor of that State is required to approve the acts, resolutions, &c., of the General Assembly before they are laws, or have the force of laws. But it is somewhat remarkable that the memorial in regard to this particular road is not approved by the Governor. The memorial which appears above it—the one asking a grant of lands for the education of the deaf, dumb, and blind—is signed by the Speakers of both Houses and approved by the Governor. The one immediately below the memorial referred to as justifying this bill, is signed by the Speaker, &c., but has no approval by the Governor! How does this happen; why this difference? I will send to the Clerk's table a letter of ex-Governor Farwell, which the Clerk will read to the House.

The letter was read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1854.

To the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Wisconsin:

GENTLEMEN: On my arrival in this city on Saturday evening, the 25th instant, my attention was called to the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, passed April 16, 1852, asking of Congress the grant of public lands to aid in the construction of Railroads in that State, upon which memorial I understand the action of the delegation in Congress has been based; and I find, on examination of the said memorial, that it is not in the form in which it passed the Legislature of the said State.

I would state for your information that an important amendment was attached to the said memorial, as it finally passed, setting forth the terms upon which the State of Wisconsin desired land grants in aid of the railroads within its borders, which amendment does not now appear in the memorial. You will find a memorial, passed April 14, of the same year, and approved by the Governor, which embodies the principles of the amendment referred to. I would also state, that the memorial first mentioned was never presented to me for Executive approval, but was sent in, contrary to usage, and without my knowledge, through the office of the Secretary of State. A reference to the acts passed by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, for the year 1852, a copy of which will be found in the Congressional Library, will show that this memorial alone, of all passed during that session, did not receive the approval, and does not bear the signature of the Governor of the State.

I have deemed it my imperative duty, as the late Governor of the said State, to call your attention to these facts, leaving you to take such action upon them as you may deem due to yourselves, and to the interests and honor of the State which you represent.

I remain, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEONARD J. FARWELL.

That is a letter from the late Governor of that State; and in looking through this book you will find the facts to be as he has represented them—that everything save this single memorial, so far as I have examined it, has the sanction of the Governor, in the way of approval, appended to it. How does it happen?

Mr. EASTMAN, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman allow me a moment for explanation?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes; but be brief.

Mr. EASTMAN. I deem it my duty to make a few remarks in relation to the matter just alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia. I will be very brief.

Mr. LETCHER. Be very short. I have but a few minutes left.

Mr. EASTMAN. This memorial is published by, and under the authority of, the State of Wisconsin, by the State printer.

Mr. LETCHER. I stated that myself.

Mr. EASTMAN. And a copy is sent here under the great seal of the State, certified to by the Secretary of State. Now, it must have passed the two Houses of the Legislature. It received the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and of the President of the Senate, was signed by the clerks of both the House of Representatives and the Senate, examined by the enrolling and engrossing committee, and then sent to the printer, at the city of Madison, within thirty days after it was passed; and now, at this late day, when the Governor has gone out of office, he comes here, some two thousand miles from home, and, in a letter, states, from recollection only, that which will impeach the acts of the Legislature which have been published to the world as a part of the laws of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. LETCHER. And that is the explanation of the gentleman! The Governor of the State of Wisconsin says that his attention was called to this matter at the time. He informed me in conversation, after examining the records, that the proviso was there; and I shall show you what sort of a proviso it was from another law. Then, in addition to that, the gentleman over the way says that it is not usual for Governors to sign such things. How came he to sign all the acts, resolutions, and memorials except this one. The gentleman near me [Mr. DISNEY] says that he was stupid in signing any of them. What, sir! stupid in conforming his action to a requirement of the constitution of the State of Wisconsin! What sort of a proviso was it?

"Provided, The terms of the grant so made shall in no wise prevent the sale of such lands at the minimum price, and in the same quantities, at which lands are now sold by the United States Government."

With all due deference to the opinions of other gentlemen, I think that it is a very sensible proviso, and I think that it would be calculated to prevent the public lands, donated to that State for the purposes of internal improvements, from going into the hands of corporations and speculators, who would keep them out of market, and so manage them as to make out of them the largest amount of profit. I have the book here with these memorials, and, as far as I have observed, this is the only one—standing out isolated from all the rest—not having the approval of the Executive of the State. If everything was fair in regard to this road, how did this happen? I will tell you how I understand it came about. The Secretary of State of Wisconsin was in favor of unlimited grants, and was opposed to the proviso which has been appended by the General Assembly. I understood the Governor to say that he took it upon himself to cut off the proviso, and withhold it from publication.

Is there not enough in this case to excite the suspicions of this House? Is there not enough in it to demand at our hands that the bill under consideration should go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and that the people of Wisconsin should have an opportunity of being heard? Let the people of that State decide whether they are for or against it. Let us have time to send to the State of Wisconsin and get a certified copy of the memorial, as it passed the Legislature, from the office of the Secretary of State. Give the people of the State an opportunity to speak out, and see how far they sustain the Governor in the course which he has taken in regard to this railroad bill. I hope, then, that the House, taking lesson from what has already occurred in the history of this case, will refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole. I hope that the House, when the friends of particular schemes have been heard to their own entire satisfaction, will not allow the gag to be applied when any other member desires to raise his voice against a scheme which he believes to be of doubtful character, to say the least of it; that they will teach this Committee on Public Lands that they must take their chances with the other committees in the House for the consideration and examination of their bills. There is nothing in this bill, it strikes me, that should commend it to the favorable action of this House. I hope, sir, this is the last time the Committee on Public Lands will attempt to gag the opponents of their bills, and force them through the House under the operation of the previous question.

But, sir, I design, at a proper time, to offer a substitute for this bill. I send it to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it may be read for information, in the few minutes of my time that are yet left. It was prepared some years ago by my distinguished colleague in the other end of the Capitol, [Mr. HUNTER.] I think its provisions are just and wise, and I hope it will receive fair consideration from those who are interested in the land question. I shall offer it, and see how far it will receive the approbation of our friends from the land States.

The Clerk then read the bill, as follows:

A bill to provide for the sale of certain portions of the public lands to the States within which they lie, for the purpose of constructing railroads and canals.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever a State proposes to charter a railroad or canal to run through the lands of the United States, and to accept the benefit of the provisions of this act, upon due notice of the fact being given to the Secretary of the Interior, it shall be his duty to set apart, of the lands subject to private entry, seven thousand six hundred and eighty acres per mile of railroad or canal, within six miles on each side of said railroad; or if that quantity of such lands cannot be found within those limits, then that amount of lands, subject to private entry, within twelve miles of each side of said public work, shall be set apart by the designation of legally authorized State officers, with the consent of said Secretary, as near as may be in one body; and the same shall be withdrawn from private entry, by public advertisement of the Secretary of the Interior, except in the manner and form hereinafter prescribed. The minimum price per acre of these lands shall be one dollar and twenty-five cents, for those which have been subject to private entry not more than ten years; one dollar for those which have been so subject for not less than ten nor more than twenty years; and seventy-five cents for those which have been so subject for more than twenty years: Provided, however, That mineral lands, salines, and lands reserved by law for other purposes, shall not be considered as coming within the provisions of this act.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever a State through which the said railroad or canal passes, and in which the said lands may lie, shall desire to do so, it may select all, or such part as it chooses, of the lands so reserved, as preemption, at the minimum prices hereinbefore established, which the lands would bear when set apart by the Secretary of the Interior. But the State must take up and pay in cash for said lands, or otherwise its right to them shall be forfeited, either within six years from the time when set apart by the Secretary of the Interior, or by the time the railroad or canal is finished, if it should be completed before the expiration of the said six years. But during this period the State may sell the lands thus reserved to individuals or corporations: Provided, That no title shall be given to the purchaser until the presents to the receiver of the proper land office, a certificate of purchase, duly authenticated, according to the law of the State from which it issues, and obtains the receipt from the said receiver, for the use of the United States, the price herein fixed as the minimum per acre for which the lands shall be sold. Upon the issue of the receipt for the money and certificate as aforesaid, the title shall be given in the manner now prescribed by law: Provided, however, That, with the exception of the certificate as aforesaid, the land shall be entered, and the title given, according to the same forms, and in the same quantities, now prescribed by the laws of the United States: And provided further, That if, at the expiration of the period beyond which the State is prohibited from entering the said lands, it shall expose them all for sale, in the manner and upon the terms herein prescribed for sales by it to individuals and corporations, that the further time of two years shall be given to it to complete the sales of said lands as aforesaid, through the land offices of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the right of way for any railroad or canal, chartered by a State to run through the lands of the United States, shall be given to the State for the use of said railroad or canal; and that in the event of a difference between the Postmaster General and the railroad company as to the compensation for carrying the mails of the United States, the matter shall be settled by mutual agreement between the Postmaster General and the Governor of the State in which such railroad lies; and that the benefit of this act can only be claimed when the charter provides, by sufficient forfeitures and penalties, (in the opinion of the Postmaster General,) for forcing the railroad company or companies to perform the said award; or when, in the case of companies already chartered, the end can be effected by contracts and stipulations satisfactory to the Postmaster General.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the lands purchased by the State under this act are to be applied by said State for the construction of the railroad or canal for which they were reserved; but the time and manner of selling them, and the mode of appropriating them, shall be determined by the State itself to whom the proceeds of this fund belong after its application to the construction of the said public works: Provided, however, That the acceptance by the State of the benefits of the provisions of this act shall be considered as implying no objection on its part to appropriate the said lands as prescribed in this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from its passage.

[I add an extract from the speech of the late Judge Woodbury, of New Hampshire, delivered in the United States Senate, February 23, 1830, on the subject of the disposition of the public lands, which is worthy of attention:

PUBLIC LANDS, SENATE, February 23, 1830.

Mr. WOODBURY. Not examining the particular kind of sales the Government can make for the common benefit, such as grants to the new States for such schools, receiving virtual compensation therefor, by having the rest of the land freed from taxation, I merely lay down what I suppose to be the general principle.

On that principle, no reasoning has been offered which convinces me that lands can be legally appropriated to any object for which we might not legally appropriate money. The lands are as much the property of the Union as its money in the Treasury. The cessions and purchases of them were as much for the benefit of all as the collection of the money. The Constitution, as well as common sense, seems to be to recognize no difference; and if the money can only be appropriated to specified objects, it follows that the land can only be so appropriated. Within those specified objects, I have ever been, and ever shall be, as ready to give lands or money to the West as to the East; but beyond them, I never have been ready to give either to either. Towards certain enumerated objects Congress have authority to devote the common funds, the land, or the money, because those objects were supposed to be better managed under their control than under that of the State; but the care of the other objects is reserved to the States themselves, and can only be promoted by the common funds, in a return or division of these funds to proprietors, to be expended as they may deem judicious.

The whole debate on these points goes to satisfy my mind of the correctness of that construction of the Constitution which holds no grants of money or lands valid, unless to advance some of the enumerated objects intrusted to Congress. When we once depart from that great landmark, in the appropriation of lands or money, and wander into indefinite notions of "common good," or of the "general welfare," we are, in my opinion, at sea without compass or rudder; and in a Government of acknowledged limitations, we put everything at the caprice of a fluctuating majority here, pronouncing that to be for the general welfare to-day, which to-morrow may be denounced as a general curse. Were the Government not limited, this broad discretion would, of course, be necessary and right.

But here every grant of power is defined. Many powers not ceded to the General Government are expressly withheld to the States and people; and right is, in my opinion, given to promote the "general welfare" by granting money or lands, but in the exercise of specific powers not granted and in the modes prescribed by the Constitution.

In fine, if the Government, on the principles of strict construction of the Constitution, cannot be prosperously administered, it requires no spirit of prophecy to foresee, that, in a few brief years, in a new crisis approaching, and before indicated, it must, as a Confederation, probably cease to be administered at all. It will, in my judgment, become a Government of usurped, alarming, undefined powers; and the sacred rights of the States will become overshadowed in total eclipse. When that catastrophe more nearly approaches, unless the great parties to the Government shall arouse, and in some way interfere and rescue it from consolidation, it will follow, as darkness does the day, that the Government ends like all Republics of olden times, either in anarchy or despotism.]

Mr. EASTMAN. In the few remarks I made some time since, relative to the action of Governor Farwell, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I did not at all impugn his motives. I am happy to have it in my power to say that he would not state anything which he did not believe to be correct. He is as honorable and high-minded a gentleman as there is in the State of Wisconsin. His honor and integrity are unimpeachable. I did not mean to be understood as impugning his motives at all, but merely to call the attention of the House to the folly of placing the mere recollection of an individual against the acts of the Legislature, placed upon the records of the State.

With reference to the Secretary of the State of Wisconsin, I have also to say that he is a highly honorable gentleman, and is above anything of the kind charged by the gentleman from Virginia. I know him well, and I know that he would scorn any act of that kind; and that although all the wealth of the State was offered him for that purpose, he would reject the offer with indignation.

In what I have said in relation to this whole matter, I have attempted merely to call the attention of the House to the question as presented between the different parties. The opposition of the gentleman from Virginia is to the whole scheme. It is not that he is opposed to this particular grant, but that he is opposed to all such grants. It is not that he dislikes to vote for a grant of land to the Rock River Union Valley railroad; because I presume that he would vote as readily for a grant to this road, as for one to the lake shore road.

Mr. LETCHER. Not by a long shot. [Laughter.] I know nothing at all of Governor Farwell, or of the Secretary of State, or any of these gentlemen, except from what little I have seen of them within the last day or two in this city. I have been introduced to them, and found them agreeable gentlemen. I know nothing of their characters, except so far as one may judge from their deportment. Their deportment impressed me favorably, and inclined me to repose confidence in them. The remarks which the gentleman from Wisconsin has made, disclaiming any reflection on Governor Farwell, show that the letter of that gentleman is entitled to very great respect. That is all I have to say.

Mr. DISNEY. I do not rise to make a speech. I desire merely to make a single remark. The motion that I submitted this morning for the previous question was made, as I stated at the time, upon the importunity of many gentlemen around me, contrary to my own wishes and judgment. My desire with regard to this bill has been to bring it up and present it for full and free discussion in every aspect in which the case can possibly be considered. I am satisfied that the decision on this bill will present a fair test of the sense of the House as to the propriety of grants of this kind. I desire to test the sense of the House upon it. Inasmuch as so much time has been consumed already in the discussion of this bill, I am opposed to its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. But I want a fair examination of it, and before the debate closes I intend to avail myself of my privilege and reply, as far as I am able, to all the objections to the bill which have been presented, and especially to the speech which has been delivered this morning by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DEAN. The gentleman from Virginia has now been heard in opposition to the bill, and several gentlemen have been heard in its favor. I think the debate has gone on long enough, and I ask the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the bill upon the table; and upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES. We cannot get through with the vote before the time arrives which has been fixed upon for the election of a printer. I therefore move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed till to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. Well, I will withdraw the motion to postpone, and let the vote go on.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the bill upon the table; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 76, nays 101.

So the bill was not laid upon the table. Previous to the announcement by the Speaker of the vote, Messrs. Grow, INGERSOLL, and ELLIOTT, not having been within the bar when their names were called, asked the unanimous consent of the House to vote, but objection was made. Mr. INGERSOLL stated that if allowed he would have voted in the affirmative.

ELECTION OF A PUBLIC PRINTER.

The SPEAKER. The moment has arrived for the election of a public printer for the House of Representatives under its order. Nominations are in order.

Mr. ORR. I respectfully nominate Judge A. O. P. Nicholson.

Mr. CHANDLER. I nominate Mr. Joseph Gales.

Mr. EWING. I merely wish to inquire whether it would not save time, as I understand that some fifty-six members were kind enough to elect a printer for us last night—

[Cries of "Order!" all over the Hall.]

Mr. EWING. And I was about to propose that we pass a resolution—

[Renewed cries of "Order!"]

Mr. EWING. Do you call that order?

Mr. ORR. I call the gentleman from Kentucky to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is not in order.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. At his request, and not because he is any especial candidate of mine, I nominate W. W. Curran.

Mr. HAVEN. I nominate John T. Towers, who is wholly disconnected with any public press. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. WALSH. I nominate J. W. Johnson, now Postmaster of this House.

Mr. CORWIN. I nominate an old friend of mine, Mr. Gales.

The SPEAKER. He has already been nominated.

Mr. HENN. At the request of Mr. Curran, who has been nominated, I wish to state that I voted for him last night in caucus, without his knowledge.

[Cries of "Order!"]

The House then proceeded to vote viva voce for the several candidates. The following was the result:

A. O. P. Nicholson.....	122
Joseph Gales.....	48
J. M. Johnson.....	8
W. W. Curran.....	7
John T. Towers.....	3
Gamaliel Bailey.....	3
Joseph Justice, senior.....	2
Edwin Crosswell.....	2
A. D. Banks.....	2
Charles M. Hall.....	1
James M. Bethune.....	1
J. Richard Lewellen.....	1
William C. Bryant.....	1
Cornelius Wendell.....	1
J. Coyle.....	1

Whole number of votes polled.....203
Necessary to a choice.....102

Major A. O. P. Nicholson, having received one hundred and twenty-two votes, was declared to be duly elected.

The following is the vote in detail:

For A. O. P. Nicholson—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Bell, Boeck, Breckinridge, Bridges, Brooks, Bugg, Boyd, Chastain, Christian, Churchwell, Clark, Clingan, Cobb, Colquitt, Craig, Cumming, Curtis, John G. For Edwin Crosswell—Messrs. Andrew Oliver and Peckham.

For A. D. Banks—Messrs. Letcher and Powell.

For C. M. Hall—Mr. Straub.

For J. M. Bethune—Mr. McQueen.

For J. Richard Lewellen—Mr. Caskie.

For William C. Bryant—Mr. D. T. Jones.

For C. Wendell—Mr. Wheeler.

For J. Coyle—Mr. Ewing.

Mr. MACDONALD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ORR. Will the gentleman from Maine withdraw that motion for a moment, to allow me to present a memorial?

Mr. MACDONALD. I withdraw it.

Mr. ORR. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to present a memorial, and move to have it printed.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. ORR. I desire to have it printed. It is a very important document.

The SPEAKER. It is objected to.

Mr. ORR. Then I renew the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at three o'clock) adjourned until to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CANAL AROUND NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. STUART. The Committee on Public Lands have instructed me to report back a memorial, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. It is a memorial for the construction of a canal around Niagara Falls.

Mr. WALKER. I was not present this morning when that memorial was under the consideration of the Committee on Public Lands. I find myself either already instructed, or about to be instructed, as usual, by the Legislature of Wisconsin, to go for this improvement. I very certainly expect the resolutions of instructions. The report of the committee recommending the instructions I have received, and I had expected, therefore, to take some individual part in urging this work. Not knowing, however, whether the Legislature of Wisconsin has any power to direct its Senators to meddle with public lands in other States, I did not know but that it might become my duty to introduce a bill granting lands to the State of Wisconsin, for the purpose of forwarding the construction of this work. I feel extremely desirous to comply with the instructions of the Legislature, and I would therefore ask that this memorial may simply lie on the table, and that the committee may not at present be discharged; so that if it shall become my duty hereafter to introduce a bill to grant lands to the State of Wisconsin for this improvement, I can move to take it up and refer it again to the committee.

Mr. STUART. I will suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin, that it certainly can make no difference in his action, if the committee are discharged. The proposition which is put forth in this memorial can never, I think, meet with any favor in the Committee on Public Lands; and I am equally confident that it cannot in the Senate.

There is a company authorized, under the authority of the State of New York, to construct a canal around the Falls of Niagara; and it is now asked that Congress shall make a donation of public lands for the same object. The case of the St. Mary's canal is referred to as a precedent, but it will be seen at a glance that the two are entirely unlike. The bill, in that case, authorized the selection of lands in the State of Michigan, to be selected by that State, which could control them, for the purposes of the construction of the canal; and by legislative action it has carried out the object of the grant, and provided for that canal being made a public thoroughfare upon certain terms.

There is not a foot of public lands in the State of New York. There is no indication to whom we shall make the grant; and if you should grant lands to the State of New York, you would give that State the right, as a trustee, to select the lands in any land State of the Union. I am perfectly certain, that however the Senator may be instructed by his Legislature; whatever apprehensions he may have on that subject, he will never undertake to give his heart to a proposition which shall make the State of New York a landholder in his State.

I did not rise to discuss the question, but simply to suggest to the Senator to allow the committee to be discharged from the further consideration of this memorial. It will not embarrass his action. He can introduce his bill whenever he chooses, on his own motion, and can have it referred to any committee; or take such other action as may carry out the suggestions or instructions of the Legislature; and it will have as much potency as if the committee were not discharged from this.

Mr. WALKER. All that I want to do is not to preclude my action hereafter.

The motion to discharge the committee was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 4th of April, 1853, certain information in regard to the amount of Federal, State, city, county, railroad, canal, and bank stocks of the United States held by foreigners; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, a report from the Director of the United States Mint, in relation to the fineness and value of foreign gold and silver coin; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, a communication from the Treasury Department, communicating further information in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 31st of January, as to the sums paid to the owners of vessels sunk in the defense of the port of Baltimore; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a report from the Secretary of State, and accompanying documents, in relation to the seizure of Martin Koszta, at Smyrna; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, in answer to a resolution of December 7, which requested him to present a plan, referred to in his annual message, for a modification of the present judicial system of the United States, communicating a report of the Attorney General on the subject; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. SMITH presented a remonstrance of the Rev. Jeremiah Day, D. D., and others, officers and ex-officers of Yale College, against the passage of the Nebraska bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a remonstrance of Albert Edgcomb and twenty-five other citizens of Groton, Connecticut, against the passage of the Nebraska bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FISH presented the petition of Mrs. Anne

W. Angus, widow of Samuel Angus, late a captain in the United States Army, praying the continuance of her pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HUNTER presented the petition of Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, praying compensation for a negro taken by the British in 1814, out of the fund provided by the treaty of Ghent for the compensation of such losses; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of Mary White, legal representative of Laurent Olivie, an officer during the revolutionary war, praying to be allowed commutation pay with interest; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of Cayuga county, State of New York, praying that one hundred and sixty acres of land may be granted to those soldiers who served in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a remonstrance of citizens of Albany, State of New York; a remonstrance of citizens of the city of New York; and seven remonstrances of citizens of Orleans county, State of New York, against the passage of the Nebraska and Kansas bill in its present form; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented two petitions of citizens of Maine, remonstrating against any infringement of the Missouri compromise; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of Jonathan Morgan, praying an appropriation to test a new and cheap plan for a railroad of which he is the inventor; which was referred to the select committee appointed on the subject.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, it was Ordered, That the petition of John McAvoy be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, it was Ordered, That Daniel Hay have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Missouri, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Shreveport, in Louisiana, through Arkansas, to St. Joseph's, Missouri, reported it back, with sundry amendments.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of William Claude Jones, praying compensation for services as an officer during the Florida war, in 1837 and 1838, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a bill to recompense the discoverer of practical anæsthesia, reported it back with an amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of J. Epes Cowan, praying the passage of an act to authorize him to locate the Vasquez and Colligan claims, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill authorizing the legal representatives of Antoine Vasquez, Hypolite Vasquez, Joseph Vasquez, and John Calligan, to enter certain lands in Missouri; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of Alexander Lea, praying remuneration for losses sustained by the destruction of the light-house on Chandeaur Island, of which he was keeper, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WELLER, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Frances Ann McCauley, praying remuneration for losses and expenses incurred by her late husband while United States Consul at Tripoli, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of the administratrix of William A. Slacum, praying compensation for his services in obtaining information in relation to the settlement on the Oregon river, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the personal representative of William A. Slacum, deceased; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred the memorial and accompanying documents of Franklin Chase, praying to be paid his proportion of the proceeds of the sale of the schooner Oregon, sold at Tampico for an infringement of the revenue laws, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSON asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill for the relief of Mrs. Arnold, widow of the late Major Ripley A. Arnold; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill to do justice to all the States of this Union; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ZADOCK C. INGRAM.

Mr. RUSK. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of Zadock C. Ingram, to report a bill for his relief, and to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill new. When the facts are stated I think there can be no objection to it.

The bill was read a first and second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Postmaster General to cause Z. C. Ingram, late postmaster at Wapello, Iowa, to be released from a judgment obtained against him in 1849 by the United States for the sum of $318 87, and all interest and costs.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Ingram was appointed postmaster to a special office in 1838. The law in relation to special offices is, that the officers shall take them for the proceeds of the offices—that the mail shall be supplied, and the postmasters discharge the duties for the proceeds. This is a uniform rule of the Department. In granting applications for special offices, it is always provided that no expense to the Department shall be thereafter incurred. Application was made for a special office at this point; Mr. Ingram was made postmaster, and a gentleman by the name of Toole became the contractor, and furnished the mails from 1838 to 1841. Mr. Ingram took the receipts of the contractor in duplicate, and sent on the originals to the Post Office Department.

In 1841 the route was advertised and let out, and this arrangement ceased. But the Department, in 1843, wrote to Mr. Ingram that there was an unsettled balance existing against him on the books of the Department, and that he had better send on his receipts. He had before sent on the original receipts, and then he sent on the duplicates, and supposed the account was settled. He heard nothing more about it till 1849, when suit was brought against him. In the mean time the contractor had died. After the judgment was obtained against him, Mr. Ingram made affidavit to the facts, and he proved, by the brother of the deceased contractor, that the payments had been regularly made and the receipts given to him. He swore that he sent on both the original and the duplicate receipts to the Post Office Department. Under these circumstances, I think there can be no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

INDIGENT INSANE.

On motion by Mr. FOOT, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill making a grant of public lands to the several States and Territories of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons, the question being on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I voted for the principles embodied in this bill when I was a member of the House of Representatives, and I feel inclined to do the same thing here; but as, in giving such a vote, I shall differ with friends with whom I usually act, I feel desirous to assign the reasons why I shall do so.

I will not attempt a defense of the motive which prompts me to vote for this bill. A proposition which looks to the relief of the insane—of a class of our fellow-mortals who are shut out, intellectually, from all the world—ought to receive, and I am sure would receive, the vote of every Senator on this floor, if he felt that he was justified, by his obligations to the Constitution and his obligations of justice to his own constituents, in giving such a vote. I shall certainly not stop to defend my motives for giving a vote like this.

The considerations which stand in the way of a unanimous vote in favor of this bill seem to be twofold: First, as to whether we have the power to pass it under the limitations of the Constitution; and secondly, as to whether the bill does justice to all the States of the Union, and to all our constituents? These questions are not altogether free from embarrassment. After having investigated this subject in the House of Representatives some years ago, I brought my mind to the conclusion that we had the constitutional right to pass a bill similar to this.

I hold, Mr. President, that our authority over the public lands is more unlimited than is our power over the Treasury of the nation. We hold our authority over the lands under a different clause of the Constitution from those clauses which authorize us to use the public money. Congress has power "to dispose of" the public lands. This power, I apprehend, is only limited by this: That they shall not be disposed of for purposes which are in themselves unconstitutional.

You have no right to increase or diminish the President's salary, or the salary of some other officers during their term of office. You could not, therefore, under the general power to dispose of the public lands, give them to the President, or give them to any other officer whose salary is fixed by law, and which must neither be increased nor diminished during his continuance in office. But unless there be some limitation like this, imposed by some other provision of the Constitution than the one to which I have referred as giving us power to dispose of the public lands, I hold that you may use them for whatever purpose you may select; and upon this principle the Government has uniformly acted from its organization down to the present hour.

What, sir, have we done in reference to the public lands heretofore? We have given them away to erect public buildings in the States; we have given them away to establish common schools in the States; we have given them away to endow colleges in the States; we have sold them at every conceivable price, from twelve and a half cents an acre up to fifty and sixty dollars an acre. We have given them for works of internal improvement in the States; we have given them as bounties to soldiers, to whom we owed nothing but debts of gratitude—soldiers who had been paid off and discharged forty years before we made the gift.

Under the act of 1841 you absolutely gave to each of the new States of the Union 500,000 acres of these lands, for a purpose which my southern friends insist is one not to be patronized from the general Treasury; to wit, for purposes of internal improvement. Only two or three years ago you made a relinquishment of millions upon millions of acres of lands to the new States, by what is commonly called the swamp land bill. If we examine all these schemes, I apprehend it will be found, taking them all together, that they have been passed by a unanimous vote in this body. In other words, I think it will be found that there is not a member of the Senate who has not, at some time, voted for some one of these propositions. And why? Because Senators have been in the habit of regarding our powers as unlimited over the public lands, except in the instances which I have pointed out, and those which are similar.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] yesterday said that he could not draw the distinction between dividing the public lands for this object, and in the way proposed by the bill, and distributing the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States. I hold that the two cases are different in this: That over the lands you have the unlimited control of which I have spoken, but when they have been sold, and the money has gone into the Treasury, it becomes part and parcel of that treasury, and you have no more control there over moneys derived from the sales of lands than you have over moneys derived from imposts or from any other quarter. It becomes one common treasury; and your control over one part of it is precisely the same as your control over every other part of it.

I would ask the Senator from Virginia whether he conceives that Congress has a right to appropriate the net proceeds of the sale of one section of land in a particular township for school purposes in that township? Or, in these words, suppose that, instead of giving the land for school purposes, as Congress has done, and as the Senator intimated yesterday Congress has a right to do, we should sell the lands and put the money in the Treasury, and then there should be a proposition to appropriate the money back again to the same object. Suppose the section had been sold for $1,000; could you take $1,000 from the Treasury, and appropriate it back again to establish common schools there? I apprehend not. And why? Because you cannot pursue the land after it is converted into money. When you have converted it into money, you lose that control over it, which you have and may rightfully exercise so long as it is land. This is so, because when you put it into the Treasury, as I remarked before, it becomes part and parcel of one common fund. There is no line which divides the land money from the money received from customs, or from any other source of revenue. It is not so, however, so long as it retains its distinctive character as land. The Senator from Virginia, yesterday, justified the granting of lands to railroad companies. While it seemed to be unfair towards some of the States, yet he thought it might be justified upon the ground, that by giving one section of land for a railroad, the alternate section was improved in value.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator will allow me, I said nothing about giving lands to railroad companies.

Mr. BROWN. I understood the Senator to say that the grants which we had made heretofore for internal improvements—

Mr. HUNTER. I spoke of the grants of the school sections.

Mr. BROWN. I, perhaps, attributed the argument to the wrong quarter. I heard it from some source, and was about to reply to it. If it be the fact that the giving of the alternate sections to railroads makes the remaining sections worth twice as much as before, that does not affect the question of power—as to whether you have the right to do it. That fact may furnish a very good reason why you should exercise a power already existing, but certainly it cannot confer a power which did not exist before. I would put the question of power to grant lands, as proposed in this bill, upon the same ground as the question of power to grant land to railroads. You derive it from that clause in the Constitution which gives you authority to dispose of the public lands. You get it there. The purpose for which you dispose of them does not and cannot, by any possibility, affect the question of power. If you do not have the power to appropriate the lands, no use to which you can apply them, however beneficial to yourselves or to others, can confer the power. The fact that one section of land is doubled in value by giving an adjoining section to insure the construction of a canal or railroad can only prove that such disposition of the land is wise or prudent. But it cannot confer a power not already existing under the Constitution. If you have no authority under the Constitution to grant land to railroads, you cannot assume it and justify the act solely on the ground that nothing is lost thereby to the Government, or that it may prove a speculation. If the advantages resulting to the Treasury is to furnish the rule that governs us in our use of the public lands or money, I know not why the Government should not become a stockholder in every profitable railroad or other successful scheme for speculation in the United States.

I hold this to be true, that Congress has no authority over the public money that can justify its use for any purpose other than the common benefit. The public—general, I may say universal—interests of the whole country must be subserved in the use of the public money. You have no authority to use it for local, partial, neighborhood purposes. Your authority over the public lands is less limited. With them, as I have said, you have endowed colleges, established common schools, cleaned out rivers, erected levees, constructed railroads, sold them for almost nothing, and given them to individuals without price. Could you thus have treated the public Treasury?

If Congress could endow more than twenty colleges by grants of public lands, I know of no reason why it may not endow a lunatic asylum. The same clause that authorized you to give Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, Mississippi, Alabama, and other States lands for college purposes, will justify you in giving these and other States lands for the indigent insane. If, having the power, it was a wise and judicious use of it to give lands to the sane, how much more wise and humane must it be to give it to the insane?

I do not question the power. I think the bill proposes a wise, judicious, benevolent, and humane exercise of it; and if justice is done to my own, and all the other States, I know not why I may not vote for it.

I do not desire to pursue this branch of the subject. My right being clear in my own judgment, to give the vote, my only purpose was to justify it in the judgment of others.

The next question is, whether it will be just not only towards my own State but towards all the States of the Union, to pass such a bill as this? In the outset I yield the claim which has been so often set up and insisted on that the old States have an interest in these lands; though I think they have sometimes made more fuss about it than there was any occasion for. I think I have heard the Senator from Virginia occasionally speak of the interest which his State has, in common with the other old States, in the public lands.

Now, when we propose to recognize the existence of this claim, and to some extent discharge it, the gentleman from Virginia comes in and opposes it. The distribution of the land provided for in this bill, is perhaps as near right as it can well be made.

Mr. BADGER. They cannot be perfectly right.

Mr. BROWN. As the Senator suggests, absolute right cannot be reached; no human ingenuity can devise a bill which would be absolutely and perfectly just towards all parties. There must be some little injustice somewhere; it is so in all our legislation; but this bill gives to the old States and to the new, an appropriation of public lands, and it divides them among them according to their population and territorial extent.

Now, sir, if we pass this bill, it will relieve the State of North Carolina, the State of Virginia, and all the other States from that which is a burden upon their own treasury and upon the purses of their people; for the insane must be taken care of, everywhere, in all civilized communities. Almost all of the States have made provision for this purpose, and those who have not, ought to do it, and doubtless will do it very soon; and how is this to be done but by levying taxes upon their people? Pass this bill, and you relieve them to some extent, from this taxation. I believe the State of North Carolina gets from 300,000 to 400,000 acres, and to that extent the bill creates a fund to relieve her people from taxation for the particular objects specified in the bill. It will have the same effect in all the other States. To this extent, it is just to one State as it is just to the others. Its operations will be equal, or as near so as we can make them, with a single exception which I will point out.

There is in this bill a provision, which was introduced two or three mornings ago, and which caused me to hesitate as to whether I could vote for it. It was the amendment introduced by the Senator from California, excepting that State out of the general operations of the bill. It struck me at the time that it was hardly fair to give any one State of the Union an advantage over the others, by excepting her out of the general provisions of a law like this. That there are reasons now existing why California should be thus favored may be true, but those reasons must pass away after a few years. The amendment authorizes California to locate her land upon any unoccupied and unsurveyed territory within her limits. There are unsurveyed and unoccupied lands within the limits of other States—Iowa, Wisconsin, Arkansas, and perhaps others. But these States have no right to appropriate them under this bill. They must take their land, and my State must take hers, from that which has been surveyed, offered for sale, and is now subject to entry at $1 25 per acre; and the same is true of all the States, save California alone, she being specially excepted out of the general provisions of the bill.

Every one who knows anything about the public lands, knows that there is a vast deal of difference between being confined to land subject to entry at private sale, and being allowed to go upon land which has never been brought into the market, and where you can get better land, and that of infinitely more value. I say I did not think this provision just at first, and I thought I would not vote for the bill upon that ground; but upon reflection, as it does not affect the interest of my State, and as I have the opportunity of saying that, in giving my vote, I do not mean to approve of the principle involved in the amendment, I will still vote for the bill. It does not interpose an insuperable barrier. It gives an undue advantage to California, but it works no special injury to Mississippi. My State gets the same with this provision in the bill as if it was out, and she gets it in the same way; and being able, in this form, to put upon the record that, in giving my vote, I do not desire to be understood as approving any principle which draws a distinction between the States of the Union, I can still vote for the bill.

If California cannot get her lands this year or next year, she will be able to get them much before she is as old as the youngest of her sisters—long before she will be a State as old as Mississippi. In a few years she will be enabled to realize the benefits of this bill in precisely the same way that Mississippi and other States realize them now. Still I do not interpose this as an insuperable barrier to my vote. Without detaining the Senate further, I have only to say, in conclusion, that having given to the bill all the reflection which my time and opportunities have allowed me, I feel prepared to vote for it.

Mr. BUTLER. Consistently with the opinions which I have always entertained and expressed, and the votes which I have given on this very bill, I must be allowed to state the reasons why I am opposed to it. I am more particularly led to do so since hearing the remarks of my honorable friend from Mississippi.

I believe the intentions of this bill to be good. I think it looks to justice, and has in it the spirit of equality, of which I approve; and as far as I could subserve the commands of benevolence, if I could substitute my discretion for constitutional authority, I might vote for it. But I cannot compromise my principles; and I think that this will be the most dangerous bill, so far as regards the disposition of the public lands, ever passed; because it will be referred to as a precedent, although dictated under auspices and influences which it is very difficult to resist; but when once the precedent is made, I think others will follow it. Now, sir, I cannot see how Congress can disregard the limitations of the Constitution, and say that, in disposing of the public lands, you can give them away for this purpose or that purpose, according to our judgment. I do not know how many grounds have been taken to justify the disposition of the public lands. At one time, public lands were asked to cut a canal around the Falls of St. Mary's, and it was put upon the war power. Public treasure was required for the Collins steamers, and it was put upon the war power. This bill proposes to distribute the lands to the States, and it is put upon the ground of benevolence. Another one was introduced to give alternate sections within fifteen miles of the road, and that was put upon the ground of regulating commerce. Another has been introduced upon a still separate ground; and at last the whole thing resolves itself into this, that the congressional discretion of the day shall supersede the limitation and the intentment of the Constitution.

Now, I take this broad ground, that Congress had delegated to it the authority to dispose of the public lands as a trustee; and having taken upon it the responsibility of a trustee, it cannot divest itself of that responsibility by throwing it back upon the State. There is so much money in the Treasury, lands and assets, committed to this trustee, to be administered according to the obligation of the Constitution. Suppose Congress were to undertake to divest itself of all responsibility, and to throw back the assets and the lands committed to its judgment, exclusively upon the States, still I deny, as a State-Rights man—a proud man, not choosing to accept charity upon the terms which Congress may dictate—that Congress has the right to give to South Carolina any money, and to tell her what she shall do with it. It has no right to do so. If I were to accept it at all, it would be as a fair distribution of the public funds or land; but if you can give it to South Carolina, to Indiana, or to Michigan; and say to South Carolina, Indiana, or Michigan, you may appropriate it for the purpose of the poor and insane, is there any limit upon it? Will you not have the right to dispose of the public money for the purpose of relieving the poor, for establishing military academies, or for establishing colleges? There is no discretion except the discretion within the sphere of our judgment; and our judgment may prescribe a pretty broad sphere for its operation.

My friend from North Carolina, I recollect once, when some one was opposing an appropriation, asked how much it was. Some one said $5,000. "That is little enough for the purpose," said he. Another said it is $50,000. "Is that all," he replied. With regard to this latitudinal proposition, that you can prescribe to a State what she can do with the funds which you give her, I regard it as one of the most dangerous and mischievous that could be adopted. If I were to introduce an amendment to say that it should be for military academies, under the power of declaring war, I could very well say that we should have these academies for preparing officers and soldiers as the best point. There would be some semblance of propriety in that; but I know no jurisdiction of Congress over the insane. Is that a national object? Nor over the poor. Is that a national object? Is a local charity to be controlled by legislative benevolence? and is the Constitution to have no limitations but such limitations as, I again repeat, the benevolence of this body may dictate?

I heard the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] yesterday make a remark that these lands ought to be settled by men who have hearts and hands; and while I felt fully the force of that, I knew that he could not, consistently with himself, take the position without being in conflict with many propositions for which he and many others have been voting. Are corporations, and steam-engines, and railroads such tenants as have hearts and hands? I have always understood that a corporation had no soul; and yet they will vote for grants of lands for corporations to make railroads. They will vote for railroads at one time; for money at another; for the insane at another; and, taking it all in all, I know no limit to the administration of the public funds and lands except, I repeat, the limit of legislative discretion; and I am not going to trust to the discretion of any man. I say, if you adopt this, there is no limitation at all. I am sorry to say that I shall vote against it more reluctantly than against any measure which has been brought before Congress; for it is equal, it is just, and it is benevolent.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. I will ask him whether he did not vote for the bounty land bill?

Mr. BUTLER. What bounty land bill?

Mr. BROWN. The bill making grant of land to soldiers in the war of 1812.

Mr. BUTLER. I have never heard of the bill. It has not come up so far as I know. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. Many of the Senator's constituents have got land under it, whether he has heard of it or not. I refer to the bill of 1847, granting bounty land to the soldiers in the war of 1812, and the Indian wars.

My object in asking the Senator the question was this: When we passed that bill we certainly did not propose to pay a debt that the Government owed. The soldiers who had performed the services had been fully paid off and discharged long before. Thirty years after they had performed the services, Congress paid what the Senators and Representatives chose to regard as a debt of gratitude, simply, by voting them a bounty in land. It was scarcely a bounty, for it was not as an inducement to the soldier to go to war; it was not given to him in consideration of anything he had done, but as a mere naked gratuity on the part of the Government, in the discharge of what is regarded as a sort of debt of gratitude. Now, if we could appropriate lands to pay a debt of gratitude, why can we not appropriate them to purposes of benevolence as this bill proposes to do? If you can give to a soldier one hundred and sixty acres of land, when you owed him nothing, when you had paid him and discharged him, and he had been pursuing his own business thirty years, why can you not give a little land for the benefit of the insane? In other words, if you can appropriate land without a consideration to people capable of taking care of themselves, and having all the senses with which God has endowed them, why can you not appropriate a little in the same way to people who have not their natural senses, whose minds are perfect blanks?

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, but I will reply to my honorable friend now. I did not expect to have this episode, but I will reply.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senator will permit the special order to be called up, and he can go on to-morrow morning.

Mr. BUTLER. I always like to reply to an interrogatory right off. I have always understood that the soldiers employed by the United States, as those connected with the Government of the United States, as the agents of the United States, should be rewarded by the Government, as all nations do in relation to their own officers. The militia of each State are not the soldiers of the United States. All Governments have a pension list. This was but a pension list in a new form; it is a pension list bestowing upon the soldier who encountered the perils of battle and left his home to fight for the rights of his country, a pension. And it is one of those things which enter into the system of every country which employs soldiers to conduct its operations of war. The soldiers of 1812 were not the officers of South Carolina, of North Carolina, or of Virginia. Their services were referable to a different authority—the authority of the United States. And allow me to say upon that subject, though I might have originally had doubts, I am one of those who, instead of erecting monuments, piling up stones of marble, and writing upon them splendid inscriptions of the nation's gratitude, prefer, when soldiers and sailors encounter dangers and perform duties upon the battle-field, to make them living monuments of my gratitude and magnanimity.

Mr. BROWN. That is all well enough.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow, so that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. FOOT. I hope the Senate will take a vote on the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the special order will be taken up, because I have a word or two further to say upon this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. As the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, is not this bill postponed as a matter of course?

The PRESIDENT. As it is under consideration, it must be disposed of by a vote of the Senate. The motion to postpone was agreed to.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. CLAYTON continued and concluded the speech which he commenced yesterday.

Mr. CHASE next addressed the Senate.

Mr. BADGER interposed some remarks respecting a petition which had been presented by the Senator from Ohio, in which Senators were severely animadverted upon.

Mr. CHASE responded at some length.

Mr. DIXON addressed the Senate in relation to the position of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. DOUGLAS obtained the floor, but he remarked that, being desirous to take the vote this evening, he should not consume the time of the Senate by making an argument. He, however, yielded the floor to permit a discussion to continue, in which Mr. Dixon and Mr. CHASE took part.

Mr. CASS also addressed the Senate.

Mr. STUART, Mr. BADGER, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. WALKER, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. CASS, Mr. WELLER, Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, and others continued the debate until half-past six o'clock, when Mr. CHASE's amendment was rejected—yeas 10, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Fessen-den, Fish, Foot, Hamlin, Seward, Smith, Sumner, and Wade—10.

YAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benjamin, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Clay, Clayton, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Morton, Norris, Pettit, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Shields, Slidell, Stuart, Toucey, Walker, Weller, and Williams—36.

Mr. BADGER moved to amend by inserting—

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to revive or put in force any law or regulation which may have existed prior to the act of the 6th of March, 1820, either protective, establishing, prohibiting, or abolishing slavery.

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered, and taken, and resulted—yeas 35, nays 6; as follows:

YAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benjamin, Brodhead, Butler, Clay, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Gwin, Hamlin, Houston, Hunter, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Morton, Norris, Pettit, Pratt, Seward, Shields, Slidell, Smith, Stuart, Toucey, Walker, Weller, and Williams—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Brown, Dodge of Wisconsin, Johnson, Rusk, and Sebastian—6.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. DOUGLAS moved to amend by striking out the provisions giving to the Governor of each of the proposed Territories an absolute veto power; and also, the provision requiring that the laws passed by the Territorial Legislatures should be submitted to Congress, and if disapproved, should be null and void, and to insert in lieu of them the following:

Every bill which shall have passed the Council and House of Representatives of the said Territory, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the Governor of the Territory. If he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the House in which it shall have originated; who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and, if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a law; but in all such cases, the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the Governor within three days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it; unless the Assembly, by adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON moved to amend by striking out, in the provision conferring the right of suffrage and holding office, these words:

"And those who shall have declared on oath their intention to become such, and shall have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the provisions of this act."

So that it shall read:

"Provided, That the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States."

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

After debate, in which Messrs. WALKER, PETTIT, ADAMS, and CHASE took part, the question was taken by yeas and nays on the amendment, with the following result:

YAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benjamin, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Clay, Clayton, Dawson, Dixon, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Morton, Pratt, Sebastian, and Slidell—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Gwin, Hamlin, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Pettit, Seward, Shields, Smith, Stuart, Sumner, Toucey, Wade, Walker, and Williams—21.

So it was agreed to.

Mr. CHASE. I move to amend the substitute by striking out the second section, and inserting the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, as soon as may be, after the passage of this act, there shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners, resident in said Territory, who, or a majority of them, shall proceed to divide the said Territory into suitable election precincts, and shall appoint places for holding elections therein; and by proclamation published in two or more newspapers circulating in said Territory, and by such other means as they may deem most effectual for the purpose, shall, during four weeks preceding the first Monday of September, 1854, notify the people of said Territory of such division and appointment, and that there will be held on the second Tuesday of October, 1854, an election for Governor, secretary, judges, members of the Council, members of the House of Representatives, and Delegate in Congress, of said Territory, as hereinafter provided; and the voters of said Territory, in pursuance of said proclamation, are hereby authorized to assemble at their respective places of election, within their several election precincts, and appoint one person to act as judge and another person to act as clerk of the election, and then to vote by ballot for one person to be Governor, one person to be secretary, three persons to be judges, thirteen persons to be members of the Council, twenty-six persons to be members of the House of Representatives, and one person to be Delegate in Congress, of said Territory; and the judges and clerks of election in the several precincts shall forthwith make out and transmit to the commissioners aforesaid a correct statement of the names and number of electors, and of the votes cast for each candidate for the several offices aforesaid, and the said commissioners, or a majority of them, shall, within ten days after the first Monday of December, 1854, issue their proclamation announcing the result of said election, and shall notify the several persons having respectively the highest number of votes for the several offices aforesaid, of their election to fill the same, and shall also, in said proclamation, designate a place for the temporary seat of government of said Territory, and a time not later than the first day of May, 1855, for the assembling of the Legislature thereof; and the Governor so elected shall hold his office for two years from the first Monday of December, 1854, and shall reside therein; he shall be commander-in-chief of the militia thereof; may grant pardons and respite for offenses against the laws of said Territory, and reprieves for offenses against the laws of the United States, until the decision of the President in respect thereof can be made known; shall commission all officers who shall be appointed to office under the laws of said Territory, and shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed therein.

The question was taken by yeas and nays on the amendment, with the following result:

YAYS—Messrs. Chase, Fessenden, Foot, Hamlin, Norris, Seward, Shields, Smith, Sumner, and Wade—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benjamin, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Clay, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Morton, Pettit, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, and Williams—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHASE. I move to amend the substitute by striking out all of the first section after the word "Nebraska," and inserting:

That all that part of the United States included within the following limits, except such portions thereof as are hereinafter expressly exempted from the operation of this act, to wit: beginning at the southwest corner of the State of Missouri, thence running west on the line of 36° 30' of north latitude, until it intersects the one hundred and third meridian of longitude west from Greenwich; thence north on that meridian until it intersects the thirty-eighth parallel of north latitude; thence west on said parallel of latitude to the summit of the Rocky Mountains; thence northward, and along upon the summit of said Rocky Mountains, to the western boundary of the Territory of Minnesota; thence southward on and with said boundary to the Missouri river; thence down the said river to the State of Missouri; thence south on and with the western boundary of said State to the place of beginning, be, and the same is hereby, created a temporary government, by the name of the Territory of Nebraska.

After debate, which was participated in by Messrs. CHASE, WADE, and MASON,

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered and taken, with the following result:

YAYS—Messrs. Chase, Fessenden, Foot, Hamlin, Seward, Smith, Sumner, and Wade—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benjamin, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Clay, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Morton, Norris, Pettit, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Shields, Slidell, Stuart, Walker, and Williams—34.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, moved to amend the provisions in regard to the boundary of the proposed Territories, so that they should not interfere with the present limits of Utah Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The substitute, as amended, was agreed to, and the bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The question being on concurring in the amendments made by the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, at the request of Mr. WALKER the amendment adopted on the motion of Mr. CLAYTON, prohibiting foreigners from voting or holding office, was excepted.

Mr. ADAMS, at twenty-five minutes after eight o'clock, p. m., moved that the Senate adjourn; but the motion was not agreed to, there being, on a division—ayes 15, noes 22.

The question being on concurring in that amendment,

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

After a debate, in which Messrs. PETTIT, WALKER, ATCHISON, and DOUGLAS participated, the question was taken by yeas and nays on concurring in the amendment, and resulted as follows:

YAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benjamin, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Clay, Dawson, Dixon, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Morton, Pratt, Sebastian, and Slidell—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Hamlin, James, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Pettit, Seward, Shields, Smith, Stuart, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Williams—20.

So it was concurred in.

The question recurring on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted:

YAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Benjamin, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Clay, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hunter, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Morton, Norris, Pettit, Pratt, Sebastian, Shields, Slidell, Stuart, and Williams—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Hamlin, James, Seward, Smith, Sumner, Wade, and Walker—12.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BADGER. I desire now to give notice that I shall introduce a resolution to suspend the rule which sets apart to-morrow for the consideration of private bills, in order that the Nebraska bill may be considered. The resolution setting apart Fridays for private business being in the nature of a rule, it requires a previous day's notice to suspend it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let the resolution be offered now.

Mr. PRATT. It can be considered as written. The resolution is considered as having been written, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and

The Senate adjourned.

[The debate above referred to will be found in the Appendix.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation, in regard to the statement which I made yesterday in reference to the Secretary of State of Wisconsin.

No objection being made, leave was granted.

Mr. LETCHER. In my conversation with Governor Farwell, in regard to the proviso attached to the memorial which has been the subject of so much discussion in this body, I understood him to say that the proviso was taken from the memorial by the Secretary of State. In this, he informs me, I misunderstood him, and that he did not mean, nor does he now wish to be understood, as saying that the Secretary of State made the alteration; but that it was made in his office.

He assures me that the Secretary of State is a gentleman of high respectability and character. He has furnished me, this morning, a telegraphic dispatch, dated Madison, Wisconsin, March 1. It is as follows:

"The amendment, which was left off by the enrolling clerk, was as follows:

"Provided, That such lands so granted shall be constantly in market until sold, at the price of one dollar and twenty five cents per acre, or less, as the case may be: And provided further, That no such lands shall be sold except to actual settlers."

"I will send you the journals by next mail."

This is all I have to say.

PUBLIC LANDS FOR PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I rise for the purpose of asking the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, with a view to have it referred to the Select Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The SPEAKER. If not objected to, the gentleman will be allowed to present it.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the special order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks the unanimous consent of the House to present a bill, for the purpose of reference.

No objection being made, the bill was introduced, read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Special Committee on the Pacific Railroad:

A bill to grant the right of way for one or more railroads, not however to exceed the number of three, across the public lands, from commercial points on the Gulf of Mexico, on the Mississippi river, to commercial points in California and Oregon; and, also, to grant, by donation, to actual settlers, on the condition of occupancy and cultivation for the length of time therein named, every alternate third quarter section of the public land, for forty miles in width on each side of said railroads, throughout the whole length thereof; and, also, to grant every alternate third quarter section of the public land, within the aforesaid limits, to aid in the construction of said railroads.

COMMUNICATIONS FROM DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 13th ultimo, transmitting a letter from the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, accompanied by a statement prepared by him, containing "the names of all persons who, since the 4th of March, 1853, have drawn funds from the Treasury of the United States, any compensation, either as outfit or salary, for services as ministers plenipotentiary, chargé d'affaires, or secretaries of legation at any foreign courts, specifying particularly the amounts paid to each respectively, with the date of payment thereof, the duration of their residences at the courts to which they were commissioned;" which was ordered to lie upon the table, and printed.

Also, a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting the report of the director of the United States Mint, of the fineness and value of certain foreign gold and silver coins, as required by the acts of Congress of January 25, 1834, and March 3, 1843; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

Also, a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting for the consideration of Congress the copy of a letter from the collector of the customs at New Orleans, recommending the purchase of the ground and buildings constituting the Boarding Station, at the Southwest Pass of the Mississippi river, and submitting the proposition of the owner to sell the same to the Government for the sum of $3,500; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the special order. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

CHINCHA ISLANDS.

Mr. SOLLERS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for a moment, to allow me to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution. It will take but a single moment.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read for information.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the House if any negotiations have been had between this Government and the Government of Peru, in regard to the reduction of the price of guano imported into the United States; and, if any, what is the state of the said negotiations.

Resolved, That, if it has not already been done, the President of the United States be requested to cause negotiations to be opened with the Peruvian Government, either for the purchase, by the Government of the United States, of one or more of the Chincha Islands; or for the abolition of the Anglo-Peruvian monopoly, by which guano is sold in this country at the present high prices.

Mr. SOLLERS. I ask that the resolution be considered now.

Objection was made.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Dawson's motion, and agreed to—ayes 74, noes 51.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Olds in the chair.)

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, they had under consideration special order of the House, being House bill (No. 37) "to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified."

The pending question is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. YATES,] to strike out the words "quarter section," and insert in lieu thereof "320 acres."

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I offer the following amendment: to insert after the word "land," in the sixth line of the first section, the following:

And no location shall be made upon any quarter section of land upon which there is an improvement.

Mr. Chairman, in moving the amendment which I send to the Clerk's table I do not desire to be understood as entertaining any unfriendly feelings to the bill. On the contrary, I am in favor of it. But while I am disposed to favor its passage, I am unwilling that the bill shall pass without securing the actual settler in his improvement. Many persons now residing in Arkansas, and I suppose in all of the new States, have settled upon the public lands, and, by industry and economy, have been enabled to secure a part of the lands upon which they may reside; and I believe in almost every instance have a bona fide intention of securing such additional lands as may be necessary for the support of themselves and families. I am in hopes that the chairman of the committee who reported this bill will offer no objection to this amendment. It is only intended to protect the actual settler.

What, sir, would be the effect of the amendment which I offer? It is this: No person who would be entitled to the bounty which this bill proposes to give, would have a right to make his location upon any quarter section of the public lands upon which there is an improvement. It may be said that the actual settler is entitled to the benefits of the preemption laws. In answer to this, I would say, that in many instances the settler would be protected by the preemption laws; but there are a great many settlements where the settler's right to preemption has been forfeited, and the land offered for sale. All these lands are now subject to entry by any person. The actual settler failed to avail himself of the benefit of existing preemption laws, not because he was unwilling to purchase his home, but because he was unable to do so previous to the day of sale. My object is to secure to him the right to extend his farming operations, by preventing any other person from locating upon any quarter section upon which there is an improvement; and to enable the settler to locate it to the exclusion of every other person, if he desires to do so. And the amendment offered will not secure him this right. I shall offer a further amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield for the amendment again to be read. We in this part of the Hall do not understand it.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. JONES. The object of the mover in proposing this amendment, I think, is to secure the right, or rather, to prevent an interference with the right of those who have already settled upon the public lands, and who are entitled to the privileges of preemption. If that is the object, the mover and the committee, I think, will see that it is wholly unnecessary, and that the proviso to the last section of the bill fully secures to those who are entitled to preemption rights, all the benefits of the general law.

Mr. GREENWOOD (interrupting) was understood to say, although very imperfectly heard, that there were a great many settlers who had made improvements on lands, who had forfeited their rights to preemption, not because they were unwilling to enter the lands, but because they were unable to comply with the requirements of the preemption laws.

Mr. JONES. Well, if that is the fact, they will have the right, as soon as this bill is will have passed, to go to the land office and make their entries under this bill, and it certainly will not be the policy of this House to continue the preemption right to make entries under this bill for an indefinite period, which will be the case if the gentleman's amendment should be adopted and incorporated into the bill. The lands which he says these persons are now upon are subject to entry by any person at a dollar and a quarter an acre. If you pass this bill any person may go and make a location upon them, I suppose; but the person who is already upon the land can make the first entry under this bill, and secure to himself the benefits of it. It cannot be said that he will not be able to do this, because he is not now able to enter his land by paying two hundred dollars. I think the amendment wholly unnecessary, and fully provided for in the last section of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "improvement," the words "and settlement."

I confess, Mr. Chairman, I have not been very familiar for some years past with the details of the action of this House or with its legislation; although, I have, like other citizens, looked into the newspapers, from time to time, to see what was being done here. But I was taken by surprise when I came here and found that one half of the time was taken up in efforts, in one form or another, to get into the public Treasury, and the other half in putting upon the country some new-fangled and unprecedented policy—some rash and highly-dangerous experiment.

Now this subject of giving away the public lands was discussed and repudiated thirty years ago. The great difficulty of this country is its rapid expansion and settlement. When this world was made and finished for man, he was charged with the duty of subduing as well as replenishing it, and it is because he took the liberty to divorce the two duties, and to go on replenishing the world without making any improvements in arts, sciences, or anything else, that three quarters of the world have been in a state of barbarism for six thousand years. Sir, I know no good reason why this committee should go to work and stimulate an unnatural emigration from the older States into the new ones.

Sir Robert Peel, a few years before his death, was invited by the inhabitants of the old manufacturing district where he was born to visit them, during a recess of the Parliament. He did so, and made a short speech to them. He told them that all Americans, and many Englishmen, imputed our great prosperity in population and wealth to our institutions, but that the experiment of self-government had not been fully tried—

Mr. DAWSON. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman is making a strong speech; and he is, I suppose, for that reason, out of order.

Mr. SIMMONS. He ascribed our prosperity and success to our country, rather than to our institutions. He said that we, unlike England and other old countries, which had but little land compared with the population, had a fine western country for the emigration of our annually-increasing population, and that in that way we had become a great and intelligent people.

Now would it be of any great use to this country to have our population spread all over North America? Civilization has a moral as well as a material element; and you must have your schools and churches. Why, it is an old maxim that a man stands more in need of intelligence in a republic than in a monarchy. The Spaniards spread themselves all over the country, mix up with the Indians, or become amalgamated with them; but we stay at home, build school-houses and churches, and everything of that sort, and get so that we know something. That is the difference between our countrymen and the Spaniards in America. [Laughter.] The President, in his annual message, advises that it is proper to enlarge the preemption right, and I am willing to extend it to all the unfortunate and poor without money and without price. If a system of that sort is established, let us go on and provide means for lessening the price, or exempting the land entirely from payment. The throwing open of the public lands to speculation is to make the rich richer and the poor poorer; and for that reason I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am opposed to the amendment, and during my five minutes I ask for the reading of the 34th rule. I ask the Chair to enforce it:

"34. No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House, or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close the debate; provided, that where debate is closed, by order of the House, any member shall be allowed, in committee, five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which any member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate on the amendment; but the same privilege in debate shall be allowed in favor of the amendment; and neither the amendment nor an amendment to the amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof unless by the unanimous consent of the committee."

Mr. JONES. The Chair will see the importance of enforcing that rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already decided that gentlemen must confine themselves strictly to argument for or against the particular amendment under consideration.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question then recurring on the amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. COBB. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to offer an amendment here, and I know that the chairman of the committee who reported the bill [Mr. Dawson] will have no objection to it. My amendment is to insert in the sixth line, after the word "unappropriated" the word "agricultural." The object of this is to confine the settlers in making locations to agricultural lands; and I know there can be no objection to the introduction of that provision.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. DAWSON. Not at all. I do not accept it. Mr. COBB. Well then, sir, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not disposed to accept of anything which would improve the bill, I propose to show to the committee the propriety of the adoption of the amendment that I have suggested.

The gentleman's bill as it now stands authorizes citizens to locate on any of the unappropriated public lands of the United States, mineral as well as agricultural lands. Is it the object of this House that citizens shall have the privilege of locating on quarter sections of mineral lands? If so then do not vote for my amendment. But, if it be the object of the House to confine settlers to quarter sections of agricultural land, you will vote for it. This is all I have to say in support of it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman from Alabama one question. It is, whether mineral lands are subject to private entry now?

Mr. COBB. You have not the words "private entry" in the bill.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman from Alabama will look at the last page of the bill, he will find that these words are used:

"Provided, however, That all persons entering land under the provisions of this act shall, as near as may be practicable in making such entries, be confined to each alternate quarter section, and to land subject to private entry: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to impair, or interfere in any manner whatever, with existing preemption rights."

Mr. COBB. I will state, so far as that question is concerned, that it was referred to the Commissioner of Public Lands when we had the question under consideration in our committee, and he suggested the importance of such an amendment. If the House think that the amendment is unnecessary, and that the bill is explicit enough in its present condition, why let them so determine by voting for the bill as it stands. If this provision, on the contrary, be deemed requisite, and that settlers shall not be authorized to enter on any mineral land, then the amendment does no harm. So the House can vote just as it pleases.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama another question. Are there any lands in the United States which are designated, by the laws concerning them, as agricultural lands?

Mr. COBB. Some of these lands to be thus open to private entry may yet be discovered to be mineral lands. And when they are located on by persons claiming under the provisions of this act, and when the settler gets title under these provisions, of course he will then hold the land, although it may afterwards be discovered to be mineral. For my part I am satisfied that the amendment which I have proposed ought to be adopted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois propose to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. WASHBURNE. No, sir; I do not propose that.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, a division was called for, and the Chair announced 48 votes in the affirmative.

Tellers were called for, and ordered.

Mr. COBB. My five minutes have not been exhausted. I wish to satisfy the House—

The CHAIRMAN, (interrupting.) The gentleman from Alabama yielded the floor, and is not entitled to it again.

Mr. PRATT. Will the Chair state the question to be voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama proposes to amend the bill by adding in the sixth line, after the word "unappropriated" the word "agricultural," so that the bill will read "be entitled to enter free of cost one quarter-section of vacant and unappropriated agricultural public lands, or a quantity equal thereto," and so forth. On that question tellers are ordered.

Messrs. HILL and DEAN were appointed tellers.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Is the question open to debate still?

The CHAIRMAN. It is open to an amendment to the amendment, but is not open to debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE. I do not understand the object of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to oppose it?

Mr. WASHBURNE. Yes; I desire to say a word. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] the meaning of his amendment. Was the word "agricultural" introduced simply in contradistinction to the word "mineral?" Will the gentleman from Alabama be kind enough to answer?

Mr. COBB. I mean that they shall be permitted to locate upon such lands as they can cultivate for agricultural purposes. I use the term in contradistinction to mineral lands.

As the gentleman has asked me the question, I will take the occasion to explain myself; and it is so clear of objection that I think any man who will consider the subject for one moment will come to the same conclusion that I have arrived at. If lands are discovered, even a day after this bill passes, to be mineral lands, although individuals have located upon them, they cannot be reserved from sale.

Mr. WASHBURNE. I can perceive, from the gentleman's explanation, that if the bill be amended in the manner which he proposes, very great objections will arise to it. He says he uses the word "agricultural" in contradistinction to the word "mineral." Other gentlemen may take the ground first suggested—that it means land susceptible of cultivation or improvement, and not timber land, or land of some other character.

As regards the object of the gentleman's amendment, it is to prevent mineral lands from being taken up under this law. But, as I understand the matter, there are no mineral lands, known under that term, which are subject to private entry. I live in a mineral country, in an old mining country, and those mineral lands were never subject to private entry until after Congress had passed a special act, making them liable to private entry at double the minimum price. There are none of those lands which are now subject to private entry at the minimum price, and very few at any price. Those that have not been entered are tracts in the mining region upon which no mineral has been struck, and which is worthless for agricultural purposes.

Hence I can see, very plainly, the embarrassment which the adoption of this amendment would lead to. It would not affect anything, as there are no mineral lands which can be entered under the existing laws; and, besides, other questions might arise upon the meaning of the term "agricultural," which the gentleman proposes.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, by inserting after the word "agricultural" the words "except mineral lands."

I am not disposed to leave any confusion in reference to the meaning of our action here. If it be not the purpose of the House to allow mineral land to be occupied, I ask why the objection to this amendment? Will any gentleman tell me? Suppose my proposed amendment is surplusage and unnecessary, no harm can result by having it inserted. Surely it must be the purpose of this House not to allow an act of this sort to be open to question and litigation hereafter. Now we know that one hundred and sixty acres of mineral land may be a princely fortune, and far beyond the benefits which are proposed to be conferred by this bill.

But, sir, that is not all. It is necessary that this amendment should be adopted because of the language of the bill. What is it? Look at the bill. I see that, according to all established principles of interpretation, it repeals, as far as all the previous legislation of this country goes in reference to mineral lands, all previous provisions upon this subject. It says:

"They shall enter, free of cost, one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public lands."

I do not care whether they are agricultural or mineral. And yet, under the terms of this bill, if mineral and yet agricultural, persons may have a right to locate upon them. Why not adopt an amendment which leaves no room for controversy? And in order to effect that object I submit my amendment, thinking that it ought to be adopted.

Mr. BISSELL. I think there is much in what the gentleman from Alabama has said, as also in what has fallen from the gentleman from Virginia. We certainly do not design or desire to embrace any other lands in this bill than what are called agricultural; yet there is the difficulty, so far as the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] is concerned, that "agricultural" is not a legal term as applied to lands. It does not designate any character of lands very distinctly, because it will occur to any gentleman that upon a tract of land of one hundred and sixty acres there may be one hundred acres properly susceptible of cultivation, and at the same time there may be valuable mineral lands upon it.

There is another thing to which I wish to allude. Although, as gentlemen have said, there may be no mineral lands now subject to private entry, no lands recognized as mineral lands by the General Government; yet suppose that the next day after the passage of this act valuable mineral lands are discovered. Under its provisions, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, having no power to withdraw those lands from sale to persons embraced in this bill, could at once locate and secure them. I do not think that would be accordance with the intent of those who support the bill. Although there may be no lands denominated as mineral lands subject to entry, yet there may be next week, and there would be no power, except in Congress, to prevent persons from taking them up at once.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is there any description of lands excepted from the grants to railroads under the alternate section bill?

Mr. BISSELL. I am not prepared to answer that question. I know in some cases that exception of a certain description of land has been made, and in others no exception may have been made. I do not concede that it alters the case one way or the other. There is another point to which I wish to allude. There is a description of lands which I am sure gentlemen do not mean to embrace in this bill, and they are the reserved sections upon the various railroads to which we have made grants. Is it the intention of this committee, by this bill, to allow any man who may choose to move upon the reserved sections, which are held at $2 50 an acre, to appropriate them to his own use? Most certainly not. I am sure I am not mistaken in saying, that it is not the idea of a single member of this committee that any such result would follow from the enactment of this bill.

These lands, then, the reserved sections upon these lines of railroad; these lands which may be mineral ought to be reserved; and I propose, if the amendment now pending be voted down, to offer the following amendment, which, I think, will obviate all difficulty in regard to this matter: I propose to insert, after the words "unappropriated lands," the following: "Which may at the time of the application be subject to private entry at the minimum price;" that is, at a dollar and a quarter per acre. That implies reserved sections, and it will permit the Commissioner of the General Land Office to withdraw lands from sale, or from being taken up, under this bill, whenever it shall be discovered that they contain valuable minerals. I think, therefore, that if this little amendment be adopted, should the others be voted down, it will accomplish both objects.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. With the consent of the committee I will withdraw my amendment, and allow that of the gentleman from Illinois to come in.

There was no objection; and Mr. SMITH's amendment to the amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. COBB. If there be no objection, as the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois proposes to accomplish that for which mine was offered, I will withdraw my amendment.

A MEMBER objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb,] upon which tellers have been ordered.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope the demand for tellers will be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers having been ordered, the demand cannot be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

There was no objection; and the committee agreed not to take the question by tellers.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COLQUITT. I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What becomes of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Bissell?]

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been offered.

Mr. SMITH. I withdraw my amendment for the purpose of giving him an opportunity of offering his.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understood the gentleman; but the gentleman from Georgia first rose, and was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. COLQUITT. I move to strike out the words "to enter," in the fifth line of the first section of the bill, and so to transpose the language of the section as to make it read:

"That any person who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled, free of cost, to one quarter section of vacant, unappropriated lands," &c.

Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to give every man who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States one hundred and sixty acres of land whether he enters it or not. If it be adopted, I think we shall be able to get rid of one of the most objectionable features of this bill—its injustice and inequality.

I am opposed to this bill as it now stands in principle because I do not believe it is the duty, nor do I believe it lies within the province, of this Government to provide farms for these citizens. But if that is to be done, if the Government is to become a charitable institution, assuming the proper functions of the Christian church, and of the benevolent societies of the country, let it at least possess the merit of dispensing its charities with an equal hand. There are laborers, shopkeepers, shopkeepers' clerks, mechanics, and working men in the various departments of labor, whose tastes do not lead them into agricultural pursuits, and whose avocations necessarily confine them in densely populated communities. These men are as much in need of our assistance, and are as properly and legitimately the objects of the care of this Government, as the class of persons for whose benefit the provisions are intended.

Besides, this bill goes out to the world with the imposing assumption that it is for the benefit of the poor. Here is a poor man living in a shanty, with a dozen children—for poor men are proverbially rich in that respect—destitute of means that will enable him to avail himself of the munificence of this Government, while his neighbor, who is better to do in the world, and who has no need of the bounty of this Government, packs up his luggage and moves over into the promised land.

Now, sir, I say, give the poor man one hundred and sixty acres of land. If he is able to go over and possess himself of your bounty in this new country, let him go there; but if he is not able, give him the ability to dispose of a land warrant; let him pocket the $200, provide himself with a good shelter for his family, and have the means of providing food for his children.

The system proposed by the bill is unjust. Its benefits will be enjoyed by men living in the States where the lands lie, who now possess thousands of acres, or by men of moderate means. The most needy portion of the population of this country never will realize one cent of benefit from it; and yet the bill is to go out to the country with the popular idea that it is for the benefit of the poor.

Sir, I regret, I deeply regret, that we have departed from the old Democratic Republican rule that used to be pursued by our fathers in the disposition of these public lands. Human ingenuity never devised a wiser policy. But we have departed from it. The lands are on our hands. We are uneasy till we get rid of them. We never rest contented and satisfied until we have devised some stupendous scheme by which they can be disposed of; and the more stupendous, the more friends it commands here.

Mr. GROW. I do not understand this policy to be based upon the principles upon which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Colquitt] has placed it—that it is an alms-house bounty, and that the Government is to be converted into a bounty-dispensing machine, to relieve the wants and distresses of the citizens of the country. I understand the object of this policy to be to secure the settlement of our public domain, and to secure it in that way that will most effectually promote the great and prominent interests of the country. I understand that it is a policy which will furnish the best facilities for cultivating the wilderness and making it answer the purposes for which it was designed by its Creator—the support, happiness, and welfare of the race. I do not understand that the great idea of this policy is to relieve the distresses of the poor and the wants of the needy, any more than that is accomplished by the other object, which is to secure the settlement and cultivation of our public lands.

The gentleman from Georgia moves to strike out the word "enter," because a large number of mechanics, who do not desire lands for the purpose of cultivation, cannot avail themselves of this provision. Sir, whatever advantage you secure to the great and controlling interest of the country, which makes that interest prosperous, secures vast benefits to every minor interest. In this country, the controlling interest is now, and must ever be, that of agriculture; and whatever promotes that, by giving it permanency and security, also promotes, either directly or incidentally, the welfare of every other branch of industry. It is agriculture that is the permanent and lasting interest; but you have been legislating in this Hall since the Government was founded, to build up and force into existence those of a local character—to which the climate and soil are not congenial—on the ground that you benefit all the great interests of the country. That is a mistaken policy; such legislation is productive of artificial interests from which no good can result.

I oppose the gentleman's amendment on the ground that the object of this bill, and its policy, is to secure the settlement of the land by the men who were intended by God Almighty to enjoy it—men who desire to cultivate it; to secure it to them free from the exactions and extortions of the capital of the country which has, under your legislation here, been permitted to take from their hard earnings too large an amount.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move to amend the amendment which proposes to strike out the words "to enter," by inserting, after they are stricken out, the words "by entry," so that it shall read, "That the person shall be entitled by entry free of cost," &c.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am happy that this amendment has been proposed. It affords an opportunity for the friends of the bill to speak to its merits. I am astonished when I hear fall from the lips of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Colquitt] that this bill proposes to do injustice to the poor. And an appeal is made against its merits on the score that it proposes to transform your Government into a charitable institution, and thereby supersede the proper duties of the church in this respect. In God's name, unless your churches are less charitable than the Government, let the two act in concert in relation to this very measure. We propose to give to the poor a home; and if they are so poor that they cannot get to it, then I say again, if your churches are not less charitable than your Government, they will come to their aid; they will furnish them with the means to get upon this land with their helpless families of children, though they may not have an old horse and an old cart. Is not this an answer, and is not here disclosed the very foundation merit of this proposition.

Mr. MILLSON. The two gentlemen who have risen to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia do not seem to agree very well in the reasons for their opposition. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] denies that this bill is designed to benefit the poor; or, at least, that that is its primary object. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Chamberlain,] on the other hand, defends it, because of its tendency to benefit the poor.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] seems to be enamored of this homestead bill in whatever aspect it may be presented. Like Sir Hudibras, he can "Confute, change hands, and still confute."

Last year he and I had the opportunity of discussing the subject in more elaborate speeches than we are now making. I opposed the bill then before the House. In debating the constitutional objections to it, one of the points that I presented was that it discriminated between particular classes of men. It was exclusively for the benefit of those heads of families who were worth less than $500. But the gentleman answered me, and said it was no objection to a bill that there were persons in the country who were not in a condition to avail themselves of its advantages.

Sir, I am disposed to agree with the gentleman that this bill cannot be designed exclusively, and perhaps scarcely at all, for the benefit of the poor man. The poor man will derive but little benefit from it. It is the rich man who will most profit by it. It is the rich man who will take his quarter section and purchase other land besides, in neighborhoods that are well filled up by settlers. A very poor man cannot avail himself of the benefit of the law. He cannot cultivate his land without aid. He cannot hire laborers to cultivate it; he must hire himself to labor for others. He would have to leave his quarter section to be appropriated by those who were richer than himself, because he would be unable to conform to the conditions of the law, which require continued occupancy and settlement for five years. Sir, I can readily believe that it is not the primary object of this bill to benefit the poor man. It is designed to add to the strength and power of the land States; it is designed to do that which the spirit of the Constitution prohibits; it is designed not indeed to give a preference to the ports of one State over those of another, but to give immense advantages to the people of certain States over those of all the rest. It destroys the very spirit of the Constitution, by trampling on that equality which was of the very essence of the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill should pass, all the public lands remaining in the State of Illinois would not suffice to satisfy the claims of her own population. There are now only about four millions of acres left; and her white male population over twenty-one years of age exceeds one hundred and ninety-three thousand. Each of these would be entitled to enter his quarter section. It would require more than thirty million of acres to meet their claims, to say nothing of the demands of the citizens of other States. How long would the United States continue to own lands in Illinois? There are only public lands enough there now to supply about twenty-five thousand of her population—only a little more than one eighth of the whole number that would be entitled to enter and settle on these lands. In the State of Indiana the public lands amount to only about two hundred and forty-six thousand acres, while her adult white male population exceeds two hundred and nine thousand; and their claims to public lands, under the provisions of this bill, would require more than thirty-three millions of acres. So of nearly all the other land States—

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate on the amendment is in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Chamberlain.]

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GROW. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "one," in the fifth line, and inserting "half."

The CHAIRMAN. That is not admissible as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Colquitt.] The question will be on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GROW. Then I move to insert the word "two," in the fifth line of the bill, instead of the word "one." That will be an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The word "two" is now in. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia is to strike out the word "enter." The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] is therefore not strictly in order.

Mr. GROW. How will the clause read as amended by the gentleman from Georgia?

The CHAIRMAN. It will read: "be entitled, free of cost, to a quarter section of the vacant lands," and so forth. The question now occurs on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia—

Mr. DRUM. Which is not now amendable.

The CHAIRMAN. It is amendable if the amendment be in order. The amendment submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia was not in order.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

Tellers were demanded and ordered; and Messrs. Jones of Tennessee, and Harris were appointed.

Mr. PRATT. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The CHAIRMAN again stated the question.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 67.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of Asbury Dickins, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill, entitled an act to establish a port of delivery at Lake Port, Pontchartrain, and for other purposes; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.]

Mr. BISSELL. I wish to inquire of the Chairman, what is the condition of my little amendment? I fear lest it may get swamped in this confusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that it is not before the committee. Does the gentleman propose to offer it now?

Mr. BISSELL. I do; and that it shall come in after the word "land," in the sixth line, in the following words:

"Which may, at the time the application is made, be subject to private entry."

I have but a word more to say in reference to this matter. Under this amendment, if any mineral lands are discovered hereafter, the Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, can withdraw them, so that they will not be subject to entry under this bill. That amendment then secures those mineral lands which may be hereafter discovered, and they will not be subject to entry as other lands.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I would state to the gentleman from Illinois that since the survey of the public lands in Arkansas has been made, a large quantity of mineral lands has been discovered.

Mr. BISSELL. I want the locations which are to be made under the provisions of this bill to be selected out of the lands which you, Mr. Chairman, and I may go and purchase with money at any time hereafter. I want those who avail themselves of the provisions of this act to be placed upon the same footing precisely as those who purchase with money. I want them confined to lands which are subject to private entry at $1 25 per acre at the time they make application.

Mr. COBB. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he put the minimum price at $1 25 per acre. According to his present amendment he makes two minimum prices.

Mr. BISSELL. I do not know how there can be two minimum prices. When one price is $2 50 per acre and the other $1 25, I take it that the less price is the minimum price.

Mr. COBB. I would suggest to the gentleman that he insert the words "$1 25 per acre."

Mr. BISSELL. I modify my amendment by striking out the words "minimum price," and inserting in lieu thereof "$1 25 per acre."

All I have to say is, that so far as any lands which may be declared mineral lands at the time the application is made, my amendment secures the reserved lands upon railroads.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I cannot see the necessity of encumbering this bill with this provision. The bill, as it now stands, certainly secures to those settlers the right of entering a quarter section of vacant, unappropriated land subject to private entry.

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question? Does he suppose that, under this bill, the lands, the price of which has been raised to $2 50 per acre, may be entered and taken up by the applicant?

Mr. JONES. I presume that will not be the effect of the bill; but whether it is or not, I am opposed to doubling the price of these public lands for any object.

Mr. BISSELL. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will answer my question directly, whether this bill will entitle the settler to go on and take up land, the price of which has been raised to $2 50 per acre?

Mr. JONES. I will state again, that I do not suppose the lands the gentleman refers to will come within the operations of this bill.

Mr. BISSELL. I think the gentleman will find that the provisions of the bill as it now stands will cover all these lands.

Mr. JONES. I will ask the gentleman a question. Have the mineral lands in the State of Illinois ever been settled upon? Are not the mineral lands in Jo Daviess county, in his own State, still in the possession of the Government?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have the honor to represent that county, and I will answer the gentleman. The mineral lands in that county have been taken up and settled upon.

Mr. JONES. How long since have they been taken up?

Mr. WASHBURN. They were entered under the law passed, I think, in 1847.

Mr. JONES. Well, sir, prior to that time, while there were two thousand or two thousand five hundred voters in that county, I was informed by the gentleman then representing that portion of the State that there were not, perhaps, a thousand acres of land in the whole county owned by citizens of the county. It was all held, under the name of "mineral reserve," by the Government. Permits were given, I believe, to persons to go on and work the lands, but it cost the Government more to pay the agent for giving out the permits than all that was ever received from them.

Mr. WASHBURN. That was the reason for making the law to which I have referred.

Mr. JONES. I never saw or heard any good reason why the Government should withhold from sale its mineral any more than its agricultural lands. Why, sir, the agricultural lands of the country are worth tenfold—yes, sir, ten thousandfold—more than the mineral lands.

Mr. BISSELL. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but I desire to ask him, in a different form, the question which I asked a moment ago. I want to know if it is his purpose that this bill shall give to any man who chooses to go and locate upon the reserved sections to which I have alluded the privilege of doing so?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that, so far as my vote is concerned, I would give them that privilege.

Mr. BISSELL. Now one word more—

Mr. JONES. I cannot yield further. If I could have my way, I would reduce the price of all these reserved lands to $1 25 an acre.

Mr. BISSELL. A single word, if the gentleman will permit me. If we reduce the price of these reserved sections to $1 25 per acre, that would furnish a still stronger reason why they should be exempted from the donations proposed in this bill. But, if I understand the gentleman, they are exempted. I think he labors, however, under a mistake in this respect. The bill provides that these entries may be made upon any vacant, unappropriated lands. Now, sir, these lands are neither sold nor appropriated.

Mr. DISNEY. They are subject to private entry.

Mr. JONES. And so they should be.

Mr. BISSELL. I have nothing to say upon that subject; but the provisions of this bill certainly do not exempt these lands from its operation. That is the only point to which I desire to call the attention of the committee.

Mr. JONES. I repeat, sir, that all these lands should be subject to private entry at the rate of $1 25 per acre.

Mr. BISSELL. Oh, if the House will make that provision I shall not object to it.

Mr. JONES. Well, sir, I want to know if it is not as just and fair for the Government to give a quarter section of these lands to an actual settler, as it is to give millions away to moneyed corporations?

Mr. BISSELL. I am certainly the last man to object to that proposition.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Is an amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then I ask that the amendment may be read.

It was read by the Clerk.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move to insert the words "except the mineral lands reserved by the Government."

Mr. BISSELL. They are not subject to private entry.

Mr. TAYLOR. I merely wish to say that, from listening to the debate upon this proposition, I gather that it is the object of gentlemen to reserve the mineral lands from appropriation, by those persons who choose to avail themselves of the benefits of this bill. Now, I can see no reason why, when a man has been cultivating the land granted to him by this bill for three or four years, he should be ousted from the possession of it by the Government, because copper, or iron, or any other mineral, may be discovered on it. In my judgment, when a man takes possession of land under the provisions of this bill, with the permission of the Government, he ought to be equally entitled to retain it, whether it be mineral land or "agricultural land," to use the designation of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB.] It would be a very difficult thing to draw the line.

In a vast section of the western country you can scarcely go on a foot of the public lands, for hundreds of miles, that has not more or less mineral in it, and yet that land is not withdrawn from appropriation by persons who choose to buy it; and it seems to me that there should be no such restriction on those who are to profit by the provisions of this bill. If the land is now open to private entry by citizens at $1 25 an acre, and, by this bill, you hold out inducements to the settler to go on it and cultivate it for five years that he may get a title to a quarter section—the labor of five years being the consideration—it seems to me that it would be exceedingly unjust, after he has worked the land for four years, to turn him adrift on the world because some lead, iron, or other mineral, may be found upon his land.

Mr. BISSELL. If the land referred to by the gentleman is now subject to private entry, why, under my amendment, the applicants under this bill may take it; for my amendment provides that all land subject to private entry at a $1 25 an acre may be taken under this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir; I am aware that the amendment seems to provide for that, and yet the argument of the gentleman has been that the mineral lands might be appropriated under the provisions of the bill.

I desire that if this bill passes, the individuals to be benefited by it may go upon any public land subject to private entry at $1 25 an acre, and enter it according to the provisions of the bill, whether it be agricultural or mineral land. That is exactly what my amendment provides for; but I will now withdraw it, with the consent of the committee.

There being no objection, the amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

The question recurred on Mr. BISSELL's amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$1 25 per acre."

I offer that amendment merely for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Illinois if that provision should be incorporated in the bill, and the bill passed, and then all the bills now before the two Houses of Congress, or the committees, granting alternate sections to railroads, should be passed, what portion of the public lands would be left for the settlers under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. BISSELL. I will answer that question with very great pleasure. I suppose that for fifty years to come there will be lands enough, at the rate we go on now making appropriations to railroads, to answer all the purposes contemplated by this bill.

The gentleman from Tennessee does not seem properly to appreciate the magnitude of our vast domain, and because we have two, or three, or four railroads of from three to seven hundred miles in length, he seems to think that the whole country from here to the Pacific ocean is checked over with railroads. Why, not at all. These reserved sections extend only to a distance of six miles on each side of the road—a very insignificant tract, indeed, compared with the immense amount of the public land to be found in all western States and Territories.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will say, with the gentleman's permission, that, of the immense extent of this territory, perhaps nine tenths of it will remain unsurveyed for the next fifty years. A great proportion of the land in the States and Territories on the Pacific ocean—a great deal of the land in California, in Oregon, in Washington, and in the proposed Nebraska and Kansas—will remain unsurveyed for one hundred years; and until it shall be surveyed and offered to public sale, it will not be subject to the provisions of this bill. The gentleman may recollect that there are more than three or four, or, perhaps, a dozen propositions for railroads within the State where the public land lies—within the Territory of Minnesota, but not touching any of the land on the Pacific, or between Arkansas, Missouri, and Minnesota and that ocean.

Mr. BISSELL. If our Government understands its duty, and continues to perform it as it has done heretofore, it will survey the lands and bring them into the market as fast, and faster too, than the public exigencies require it. There never has been a time when the surveys did not keep ahead of the settlers, and there never will be, if we have a Government that is fit to be called such. There is no danger on that score at all. Lands will always be surveyed far in advance of the wants of settlers.

Mr. JONES. I suppose, as soon as they are settled, if this alternate section system be adopted, it will be extended throughout the new and unsurveyed lands.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to say a few words in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. I think that we should confine the lands proposed to be donated by this bill to those which are subject to private entry at $1 25 per acre. The principle which has governed me in voting lands to the several States for railroad purposes has been that we thereby put up the price of the alternate sections and render them more salable; so that, in fact, the Government does not lose by a donation of land for railroad purposes to the States, as in the case of Illinois. It was with pleasure that I voted for that great grant of land to the State of Illinois. I opposed many of my political friends in so doing, but when I voted for it I believe that I was rendering thereby a great public service by connecting the southern with the northern portions of this Confederacy, without detracting one dollar from the value of the public land in the United States. The result has shown the benefit of the policy.

According to the intelligent statement of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] for which I am greatly indebted to him—under the Illinois grant, lands which were proffered for sale for thirty years without a purchaser have found ready purchasers at $2 50 per acre, and a country which was without inhabitants, has been peopled at that price. Then the United States are the great gainers by having a vast railroad of seven hundred miles in length, constructed for the use of all the citizens, without the loss of a single dollar to the Government. I say that I have voted on that principle; and I wish to withhold the privilege of entry to all persons to be benefited by this bill, on the alternate sections of land, on the lines of railroads which we have established.

I think, sir, that I am extending my generosity quite far enough when I agree to authorize every citizen of the United States, who wishes to cultivate land for five years, to enter a quarter section, worth $1 25 per acre, and labor on it five years for himself and family; and I oppose the gentleman's amendment for that reason.

I would not throw open these lands, which we have reserved, and which are worth $2 50 per acre, to the Government. I would give the people intended to be benefited by the bill the privilege—and it is a great privilege, one which no Government in the world, to my knowledge, extends to its citizens, except the Government of the United States—to go upon these lands, and cultivate them for five years, receive a patent, and thereby become owner in fee simple. And I say here—and I rejoice to believe it—that the man who cultivates his land for five years richly earns the $200 which he would buy it for if he had the money in his pocket.

Sir, it is the labor of the country that is its true wealth. It is the labor of those of your citizens who go upon the western frontier and settle on these lands, and become useful members of society, that is the great source of our wealth. I differ, also, with the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] in the notion which he entertains, that it will be fifty years before this country is surveyed. I have no doubt that before fifty years all the vast domain of this country will be surveyed and occupied. The population of these States now amounts to twenty-five millions. In fifty years hence there will probably be a hundred millions of inhabitants in the United States, thus showing a condition of prosperity, wealth, and power never known in the world as belonging to any Republic.

It is with a view of promoting the settlement of the new country that has induced me to change, in some degree, my views in regard to this bill. As I stated a day or two since, I opposed it because I thought that the bill introduced during the last session of Congress made invidious discrimination against those who, by their industry, had realized money enough to buy lands. I am opposed to the provision that settlers, to be entitled to their quarter sections of public land, must not be the owners of real estate. That provision is hostile to my judgment. It was omitted by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Dawson,] who reported this bill; and it is with pleasure, therefore, that I advocate the principle of this bill, and that I shall continue to advocate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, which is to strike out the words "$1 25 per acre."

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HENN. Mr. Chairman, I propose to amend that amendment by striking out the words "private entry." I understand the object of this bill, or at least one of the main objects of this bill, to be to encourage the settlement of the public lands, and thereby—

Mr. PHILLIPS, (interrupting.) I rise to a question of order. There are no such words as "private entry" in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose to strike out the words "private entry" in the bill?

Mr. HENN. No, sir; but to strike it out of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that I understand one of the main objects of this bill, and of the friends of this bill, to be, to encourage the settlement of the public lands. If we confine the provisions of it to those lands which are subject only to private entry, we give the speculating class of the community the privilege over the actual settlers. We allow them to go in first and buy the public lands, which are worth $1 25 per acre, and nothing but the refuse lands will go to the recipients under this bill. I think, Mr. Chairman, that we should endeavor to encourage those persons who wish to go on the extreme frontiers and to settle there. It is those persons who thus settle on the extreme frontiers who undergo all the hardships and dangers incident to the settlement of a new country, and it is to them that we should extend the benefit of this preemptive right, which, after all, is merely a preemptive right; because a man earns a great deal more by his labor than the cost of his land at $1 50 per acre.

Mr. JONES. Yes; they pay higher for it than anybody else.

Mr. HENN. I hope, therefore, that no restriction will be retained in the bill, and that all the lands which have been surveyed, or which shall be surveyed at the time of the application, may be granted under it, and subject to location.

Mr. BISSELL. In making this munificent gift to the citizens of this country, is it to be regarded as a hardship that they are required to select their lands from those already surveyed, or which may be surveyed, and in market, at the time when they make their application? Is that to be regarded as a hardship, at the very moment when we are consummating a gift, which, as has been before said, is unparalleled in the history of nations? A hardship to require that a man, who is already the owner of a thousand broad acres, shall, in taking this additional one hundred and sixty acres, take it from among those lands which you might go and buy with gold!

But what will be the effect of this amendment? Of course the settlers who are now located upon the frontiers of our Territories would rush over into them. Every man in the vicinity of the Territory of Nebraska, before this bill passes both Houses of Congress, would have their selection made; and then comes what? Conflicts with the Indian tribes, struggles hereafter, contests and suits and memorials to Congress, difficulties in the Departments, and all to adjust these conflicts which will arise out of the location of lands which have not been surveyed, or to which even the title has not been acquired.

Mr. HENN. I would remind the gentleman that he is not speaking against my amendment. I did not propose by that amendment to extend the provisions of this bill to lands which are unsurveyed.

Mr. BISSELL. Then I was mistaken as to the import of the amendment, and so far I stand corrected. But it extends to those lands which are not yet in market. I protest, sir, against giving by this bill, to those who avail themselves of its benefits, that which cannot be bought by other citizens with gold.

Mr. HENN. Have not citizens now the right, or the privilege, to buy, at the price of $1 25 an acre, lands before they are thrown into market?

Mr. BISSELL. They have not.

Mr. HENN. Have they not that right under the provisions of the law of 1841?

Mr. BISSELL. The man who proposes to avail himself of the advantages of this bill cannot do that. He cannot squat upon a piece of land, and, after this act is passed, avail himself of privileges which a man who has the gold to pay does not enjoy.

Mr. HENN. If an individual should enter upon lands, and make improvements, would the gentleman allow speculators to come forward and purchase those lands over his head, and thereby cut him off from all the privileges of this bill?

Mr. BISSELL. Not at all. I would give him the advantages of preemption rights just as I would give to a man—and he certainly has it under this bill—who proposes to purchase with money. I see no propriety in giving exclusive privileges and advantages in that respect to a class of men to whom we propose to donate lands.

Mr. HENN. Is it not the frontier man who desires to be benefited by the provision of this bill more than any one else? and would the gentleman allow them to settle upon unsurveyed land, and then deprive them of the privilege of securing the title to the same, by letting the speculator come in at the sale and pay his money for those lands?

Mr. BISSELL. I say no; but what I object to is the allowing them to own land before they are brought into market.

Mr. HENN. Why?

Mr. BISSELL. Because that would be contrary to the whole policy of the Government. It would be unjust to those who propose to purchase with money; it would be unjust to those who do not avail themselves of the benefits of this act; it would be unjust to those who propose to purchase a whole section.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. GROW. I offer the following amendment: to strike out all after "which," and insert in lieu thereof "surveyed or unsurveyed."

I am opposed to any restrictions of birth or property in this bill. At the last session of Congress a homestead bill was introduced in this House. It went to the Committee on Public Lands, and the $500 restriction was inserted. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] in speaking upon that bill, presented that as one of the objections he had to the bill. I was opposed to it, and voted against all amendments of that kind. I have always been opposed to such restrictions, and voted against them all, from that time to this.

Mr. COBB. I desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the Committee on Public Lands did not support the bill reported last year; it came from the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. GROW. I beg to correct the gentleman. It was in a bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN.]

Mr. ORR. The gentleman is mistaken. There was no such bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GROW. Well, sir, I stand corrected, though I was under the impression it came from the Committee on Public Lands; but it is immaterial. It came back from the Committee on Agriculture, then, with this restriction imposed upon it, against which I voted. I voted against all restrictions attempted to be imposed upon it in the House, or in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. I wish to know how he proposes to have this unsurveyed land described if a man goes to settle upon it under the other provisions of this bill?

Mr. GROW. I had an object in offering the amendment. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] was attempting to put me in a false position with reference to my action at the last Congress. I offered the amendment for the purpose of correcting the gentleman, and to say that for one I would leave the whole public lands open to settlement upon the policy of this measure. The objection of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] and others, is that it will draw off the population of the old States. Is there any man upon this floor, or in this country, who desires to retain in his own district or State a population whose happiness and interests would be promoted by a change of location? Why confine a man to misery and want beside your own doors and in your own State when he can find a happy home for himself and children in a far distant land? Is there a man here who desires to foster a policy of that kind in order to gratify his State pride?

If there was a man in my district, or that section of the State, when there is so large a quantity of unoccupied lands, who desires to seek a home in the wilderness of the West, or any part of the earth where he can better his condition, I would bid him God speed. Let him find his home where it is best for him, best for his children, best for his future prospects, and that would be best for his country.

Gentlemen from the old States have made the objection, that the effect of this bill would be to depopulate their States. I apprehend no such result. The man who leaves a farm in the old States will leave a settler in his place; for a farm that is already tilled will not be abandoned without some one to occupy it.

If you have a class of floating population that have no homes and fixed abiding place, this offer will, it is true, be an inducement to them to leave; and let them go and find such, where they can make themselves respected members of society, and can rear their children in comfort, and make them valuable members of society, instead of being, as now, crushed by the evils growing out of a dense population.

Mr. MILLSON. From what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] has just said, I am inclined to think that he placed himself, or allowed himself to be placed, in a false position at the last Congress; for if he was opposed to that feature in the bill which confined its benefits to those who had no lands, he certainly did not make his true position manifest to the House.

I made an argument in the last Congress upon the constitutional question—a folly I shall not be likely to commit again. I asked, if Congress could constitutionally confine their favors to those who owned less than $500 of property, why they had not an equal constitutional right to confine the benefits of the bill to those who were worth $1,000,000? If they could constitutionally discriminate in favor of the poor man, why could they not as constitutionally discriminate in favor of the rich man? It was at this point that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] interrupted me, and said it was no objection to a law that certain persons could not avail themselves of its advantages. He did not then state that he had any objection to the discrimination made in the bill; nor did I suspect that he had; though, from what he now says, I do not for a moment doubt that he preferred the bill without the discrimination.

The gentleman asks if I would deny to the poor men in my State the opportunity of bettering their condition; if I would deprive the paupers in my neighborhood of the privilege of leaving the State and of mending their fortunes. Sir, we have few persons amongst us who can be called paupers, and these could not avail themselves of this law if they would. Our slaves are our agricultural laborers for the most part. You will not allow either to them, or to their owners for them, the benefits of this bill.

Again, the gentleman denies that the effect of the bill will be to depopulate the old States. Sir, I think I shall involve him in something of a dilemma. If the old States do not lose their population, then of course our people can get no benefit from the bill at all. If no man would leave the old States for the purpose of availing himself of the opportunity of locating the quarter section of land which the bill allows him, then the benefit of its provisions is confined exclusively to the new States. But, on the other hand, if our citizens do leave us to avail themselves of these privileges, then we are sufferers, both in the loss of our people and in the loss of the land, which is the common property of all the States.

Mr. GROW. I have not interrupted the gentleman before, because I know such interruptions are anything but agreeable, but I think the gentleman has misapprehended my remarks. I said that no man who had a permanent home in the old States would leave it in consequence of the passage of this bill; but that a class of laboring men who have no such permanent homes, would be drawn off, and would avail themselves of its benefits.

Mr. MILLSON. I am showing that, as a matter of necessity, we shall either lose our population, or none of our citizens can derive any benefit from the bill itself. If this bill should pass, thousands of the citizens of the old States will emigrate to the West, and enter upon the land which is offered to them free of cost. We must be sufferers both in the loss of our population and of our land.

I would infinitely rather the new States should take all the lands at once. But they do not want to take the land. They much prefer that the Government of the United States should keep it in its own name, and have it surveyed and managed at its own cost. We are to be at the expense of maintaining the present land system, and they are to reap the benefits.

But I have already shown what will be the operation of this law in the land States. I have already shown that there are not enough quarter sections of surveyed lands in any State in the Union, with the exception of Iowa, Florida, and perhaps one other State, to supply the males over twenty-one years residing in those States who would be entitled to avail themselves of the privilege this bill would accord them. And, more than this, I believe the committee have already adopted an amendment giving this privilege to females also.

Mr. DAWSON. No, sir; no such provision has been made.

Mr. MILLSON. The language of the amendment which has been adopted is, "every white person over twenty-one years of age;" and this includes females as well as males.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Certainly it does; and they ought to be included.

Mr. MILLSON. Then the computation I made a moment ago ought to be doubled; and I do not hesitate to say that there is scarcely one of the land States in which the number of residents entitled to land under this bill will not exceed the number of quarter sections of surveyed lands in the State. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES], and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL], told the committee that there was so much land in these States that it could not be exhausted under the operation of this bill in fifty years. Well, Mr. President, I do not know how long it may be before these lands will be exhausted; but I do know that, according to the latest census of those States, there are not now enough surveyed land in them, with perhaps one or two exceptions, to satisfy the claims of the persons now there, who would be entitled to enter upon them if this bill should pass with the amendments already adopted. However that may be, the old States are expected to pay all the expenses of this land system; they are expected to pay the surveyor, the register, and receiver, in order that the people of the new States, and such others as may choose, may come and take up the lands whenever it may be convenient for them to settle upon them.

Mr. GROW. I will withdraw my amendment, with the consent of the committee.

No objection being made, the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope the friends of the bill will be content with voting upon the amendments that may be offered, without consuming time in discussing them.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL.]

The amendment was again read.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I call for tellers on that amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WALKER and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 77; noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, we will take the question by yeas and nays when we get into the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out the first section of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof what I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That is not in order. The proposition of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] to strike out a portion of the section and insert is still pending.

Mr. WASHBURN. Let my amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama does not propose to strike out the whole of the section. The Chair understands that this is a proposition to strike out the whole section.

Mr. JONES. It is not in order to strike out the whole section and substitute something for it whilst a proposition is pending to strike out a part.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama is to strike out a part of the section.

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir, only a part of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is to strike out the whole section.

Mr. JONES. Then it does not take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not.

Mr. JONES. Then it is not in order till that is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The question must first be put on the motion to strike out part, before it is put on the motion to strike out the whole section.

Mr. DOWDELL. Will the first section be subject to amendment after the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is submitted to a vote?

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois prevails, it will not.

Mr. WASHBURN. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] has precedence of mine.

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. DOWDELL. Wishing to avoid a constitutional difficulty, I offer the following amendment:

Strike from the fifth line the words "free of cost," and insert in their stead "fifty cents per acre."

I was sorry to hear my friend from Virginia say that he would not again be guilty of the folly of making constitutional points in this committee on this subject. It is clear, if this bill passes without this amendment, that not only the principles of the Constitution will be violated, but the deeds of cession from Georgia and Virginia, and other States, will also be palpably violated. Of the lands in the State of Alabama half are unoccupied, and are subject to the deed of cession from Georgia to Alabama. What does that say? That they shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States bona fide, for no other purpose, and shall enter into the general charge and expenditure. Now, this bill has not the plausible pretext that the railroad bills have. They go on the presumption that the Treasury is not injured, and that the remaining lands are enhanced. This has no such pretext.

Mr. DAWSON. Let me turn the gentleman's attention to the last clause in the 7th section, which is as follows:

"That all persons entering land under the provisions of this act, shall, as near as may be practicable, in making such entries, be confined to each alternate quarter section, and to land subject to private entry."

Mr. DOWDELL. But it does not say that the remaining quarter sections shall be sold for $2 50 per acre. Of all the dashes at the public domain, this is the most magnificent which has ever been projected. It sweeps away the whole of it; and who gets the benefit of it? Why, sir, it is a public invitation to unlock the poor-houses of Europe, to pour upon us a population, unskilled and untutored in the spirit of our institutions. I am willing, when they come here, to allow them all the privileges which they now enjoy. Many make good citizens. I have no objection to the present naturalization laws; but I am unwilling to give my support to any measure which will stimulate already overgrown immigration.

Sir, I want to bring this bill within gun-shot of the Constitution. [Laughter.] How do gentlemen propose to get over the difficulty? How give away the public lands? How count them into the general charge and expenditure? Fifty cents per acre will cover the costs of survey and all the other expenses. Is it not just, and will it not carry out the general objects of the bill? Is it not fair to make a discrimination of one hundred and fifty per cent.? My amendment goes to that extent. It makes a discrimination in favor of the actual settlers of one hundred and fifty per cent., and I am willing to go that far.

I think that discrimination should be made in favor of the man who leaves his home in the haunts of civilized men, and goes into the wilderness, subjects it to cultivation, and to some extent improves the surrounding territory.

If you will adopt this amendment, your bill will stand a chance of being passed by this House. There is much land in my State that is not worth fifty cents per acre; nay, not twenty-five cents per acre. And I believe we would not violate the conditions of these compacts with the States of Georgia and of Indiana to relinquish, after a sufficient time, the waste lands which cannot be sold at twenty-five cents per acre. Sir, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] well remarked, this bill will not benefit the poor classes; it will not benefit the old States; it will benefit the new States but little. It will benefit Europe most, and the population which will come thence upon us. They are the men who will settle upon these lands.

I hope the amendment will be adopted, so that, if the bill pass, we shall not be charged with the expense of surveying these lands and then giving them away.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not rise at this time to enter into any discussion as to the merits of this bill. These I endeavored to make plain to the understanding of this committee in the opening of the debate. The remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DOWDELL] are nothing more than a reiteration of the objections which have been urged against this bill over and over again. It is the objection which comes from every southern member in this House who undertakes to defeat the passage of the bill. He holds up the Constitution before us as an argument against it. Why, sir, the Constitution is a shield which may be held up to affect every scheme against which gentlemen may oppose their objections, or which they may take ground in favor of. What provision of the Constitution has been violated in this bill? I would thank the gentleman if, instead of dealing in generalities, he would place his finger on the clause of the Constitution which has been violated.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. DAWSON. I cannot, for the present, give way to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DOWDELL. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him? I ask him to show the clause in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to give away the land.

Mr. DAWSON. I referred to the clause contained in the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution in my opening speech, and which I read a few days since in my reply to the constitutional objection then urged by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH.] There the power is clearly, and fully, and explicitly given to Congress to dispose of the public domain. This constitutional right to grant and donate the public lands to actual settlers has been exercised by Congress over and over again. Even Mr. Calhoun himself, the great champion of southern rights and of strict construction, advocated the policy and constitutional right of granting alternate sections for the construction of railroads. So far the constitutional right in either case has not been questioned. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. DOWDELL,] in his sweeping denunciation of the measure, has said that the bill is intended to benefit the interests of the people of Europe. Sir, I am tired of hearing that objection. It is not warranted by the terms of the bill; but, on the contrary, the language of the bill confines the benefits of its provisions to those who are now citizens, and are now residents of the States and Territories. Beyond this it does not go. It does not discriminate against those emigrants who are now here, no matter whether they come from the Emerald Isle, the Grampian hills, the fens of England, the mountains of Switzerland, or the plains and forests of Germany. It strikes me then, sir, that if the gentlemen who oppose this objection to the bill would look critically and carefully at the language employed, they would save themselves from being placed in the position which devolves upon me the duty of correcting them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have got through answering and refuting the objections of my friend from Alabama. I have only again to refer to the fact that this bill does not encourage any foreign emigration. I have referred already to the charge which has been reiterated, and which first fell from the lips of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] that the bill is of no service to the laboring classes of the country. I do not know what may be the characteristics of the laboring classes of Virginia and Alabama; but I can tell the gentleman that in the North, where the laboring classes provide their own homes and build up their own fortunes, and in their successful career illustrate the force, equality, and beauty of our republican system, this bill will be of incalculable advantage. Who is it, sir, that settle the forests and prairies of the great West? They are not gentlemen from Virginia or from Alabama. No, sir; it is the free States that have poured into these new countries a tide of emigration, which was not checked by the barrier of the Alleghenies, which has swept onward and built up States and Territories, until it has passed far beyond the waters of the Mississippi, and is rolling on rapidly towards the base of the Rocky Mountains.

Where, sir, is Ohio, a State which came into the Union in 1802, and which at this very time surpasses Virginia herself, in numerical representation upon this floor? Where is Indiana? She, too, in the course of another decade will be here in equal power. Where is Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, Iowa, and Wisconsin, peopled with the laboring classes of this country, who have subdued the wilderness, reclaimed the waste and wet lands, built up cities and towns, and covering the Mississippi and its tributaries with a steam marine, such as no other portion of the globe can present? Sir, it is the energy of the North that cheers the star of empire in its western march. I trust that the true friends of the bill will cease to offer objections and amendments, and, with a united effort, will carry it through.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] to strike out a portion of the first section. The gentleman from Ohio proposes an amendment to that section.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I propose to amend the amendment by striking out "one quarter section," and inserting "one half section."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inform the gentleman that that proposition has already been acted upon by the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I move to insert, in the place of what I propose to strike out, "one section."

I make this motion for the purpose of responding, very briefly, to this constitutional question, which gentlemen from Virginia are so constantly springing upon this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman from Ohio, that he should confine his remarks to the consideration of the difference between a "one quarter section" and a "whole section." [Laughter.] That is not a constitutional question at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. If it is unconstitutional to give a quarter section, it is more unconstitutional to give a whole section, [laughter,] as a matter of course.

Now, sir, this public domain belongs to the Federal Government. The Constitution provides that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States." I think this is a proper disposition of the public domain.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SAGE] said that there would be great danger that foreigners would come in and take possession of some of these unoccupied lands. I have no doubt that upon every fourth of July that gentleman is called upon to deliver an address before his constituents, and that on such occasions he is eloquent in discoursing upon the fact that we have said to all the world that this is "the land of free and the home of the oppressed."

A Voice. The "brave."

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir; "the land of the free and the home of the oppressed." I would welcome those brave and gallant men of foreign lands who struggled for liberty. I would welcome the down-trodden Hungarians who fought so nobly for freedom. I would throw open the doors and welcome them all to this land. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON] says that he shall not raise another constitutional question. We had the question of constitutionality raised yesterday by his colleague, [Mr. LETCHER,] when the Wisconsin railroad bill was under consideration, when it was proposed that a young sister State in the far West should be assisted in making her roads, as we had assisted other States. It was but two years ago, I find, that a measure passed this House by which twenty-seven million acres of the public domain were voted away by honorable members from Virginia to the States in which the lands were located. I would like to understand from these gentlemen who now raise this constitutional question, where they found the authority, under the Constitution, to vote away twenty-seven million acres of the public domain?

Mr. LETCHER. Do you mean to say that I voted so?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Your predecessor did so vote. The honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] said yesterday that Virginia was against the policy of voting away the public lands; and I now refer to the vote to show that every Virginian upon this floor, with a single exception, voted to give away twenty-seven million acres of the public domain.

Mr. LETCHER. To what does the gentleman refer?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I refer to the bill granting the swamp lands; and if the Constitution is to be measured by any weather square in Virginia I should like to know it. If you have the power, under the Constitution, to give away to the States wet swamp lands, why cannot you give away dry lands to actual occupants? I call upon the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] who voted for the bill, to point me to the clause in the Constitution which authorizes him to vote for wet lands. Every man of the Virginia delegation, with one single exception—that of Mr. EDMUNDSON—voted for this bill.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] commenced his remarks by alluding to the frequency with which constitutional objections had been urged against this bill by gentlemen from Virginia. I have not argued the constitutional question. The committee will surely recollect that I referred to my having done so at the last Congress, and said it was a folly I should not be likely to repeat—at least upon this bill. I am not surprised, however, that such arguments should prove unwelcome. Perhaps they trouble gentlemen. Like conscience, the Constitution will not always speak pleasant things; and perhaps they would rather dream on, and give their votes in sweet forgetfulness that we ever had such a thing as the Constitution. For my own part, I am sometimes disposed to imitate the example of other gentlemen from the South, and remain passive and silent while these preparations are making for our execution. Yet I confess I have something of the spirit of the old countess who protested against the justice of the sentence by which she was condemned to death, and ran around the scaffold telling the executioner if he would have her head, he must take it as he best might. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] adverts to the vote given by my colleagues and myself, in the Thirty-First Congress, for the swamp land bill. I voted for that bill. I voted for it most cheerfully, never dreaming that it could be objected to as unconstitutional. I am glad that the gentleman has referred to that vote, because he will see in it the evidence that we are not so niggard of the public domain, and so tenacious of our rights in it, as to be insensible to the claims of justice.

Sir, I never for a moment had a doubt in reference to the constitutionality of giving away those swamp lands. We gave our votes for that measure with full confidence in the representations made by honorable gentlemen from the West. The official reports, which I examined, confirmed their statements. If it was true, as it was then stated, that these lands were of no present value to the Government, and were of such a character as endangered the health and safety of those living in that neighborhood, it was right that we should relinquish our title to them, and allow them to be improved and reclaimed by the States in which they were situated. Sir, there is not a shadow of a doubt that we not only have the right, under the Constitution, but that it is even our duty to give up such portions of the public domain as, possessing no value in themselves, endanger the health and safety of the people of the States in which they lie. Is the gentleman answered?

I would vote to give away, to throw away, to destroy, if possible, those public lands which are worthless, and which are only productive of disease and danger, as readily as I would vote to authorize the destruction of counterfeit notes or spurious coin, which had been received by the agents of the Government supposing it to be genuine. Would there be any fault in the destruction of such money? Surely not; nor is there any breach of the Constitution or violation of our trust in surrendering to the States in which they lie the swamp and overflowed lands which have no value as property, and are only sources of danger and disease to the inhabitants who dwell in their neighborhood.

If, as I am unwilling to suppose, we were deceived as to the real character of these lands, by the representations which were made to us at the time by gentlemen upon this floor from the western States—if, as my colleague [Mr. LERCHER] said yesterday, many of these lands have never had any water upon them, except what fell from the heavens, then I can only say, that while it would not prove we were wrong, it would only show that in future we should, perhaps, be justified in scrutinizing the statements of honorable gentlemen rather more than we have heretofore deemed necessary.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia one constitutional question. I want to know if it is not as constitutional—

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suppose it would be in order to move to strike out the first section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion will not be in order until the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB], which is to strike out and insert, shall have been disposed of.

Mr. SMITH. Then I will wait until that is done.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move to amend the section of the bill under consideration by striking out in the fifth line the words "free of cost," and inserting "at twenty-five cents per acre."

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, I offer in good faith. It is my earnest desire that the actual settlers upon our public domain shall have the public lands at such a price as will do justice to all parts of the Confederacy, and which at the same time will be liberal to them. In order to do justice to that extent, it is necessary that the expenses of maintaining the land system should be paid by those receiving the benefits of it. By reference to the statements of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, this committee will see that the cost of the surveyed and unsurveyed lands in the United States, excluding the lands in Utah and New Mexico, and California, is fourteen and a half cents per acre; the cost of surveying, managing, and selling those lands is seven cents an acre—making altogether about twenty-two cents an acre. I have put it at twenty-five cents for contingencies. The cost of issuing the patents is already provided for in the bill.

Mr. ORR. How much for Indian titles and Indian wars?

Mr. HAMILTON. Those are incidental expenses. We must provide for them anyway.

Mr. ORR. We have not bought any of the Indian lands in Utah yet.

Mr. HAMILTON. No, sir; and I do not include Utah, New Mexico, and California.

I have thus given you the estimated expense of an acre of our public domain. Is there a man in any part of the Union who can object to receiving the public domain at that cost, especially when it is considered that we of the East, the consumers of the old States and of the new, who are not disposed to participate in the benefits of this bill, must contribute to the revenue to support the expense of the system? I desire to see this stupendous and magnificent land system maintained. I desire to see the General Government maintain the control it has hitherto had over it. I desire to see this great system—a monument to the wisdom of our fathers—maintained in good faith; but whilst doing that, I am indisposed to throw the expense of it upon those who cannot derive any benefit from this bill. Let us all share in the general expenditure. But no one can expect that the system is to be maintained at our expense whilst others enjoy the exclusive benefits of our public domain.

I offer this amendment in good faith. If it is adopted, I will support the bill. It is liberal to the emigrant; it is liberal to the settler, and it is doing equal and exact justice to all. The honest settler, the pioneer, cannot complain at being required to pay this small price for the land; and then the people of the old States will not be solicitous to relieve themselves from the charge upon the Treasury for the public land system; but otherwise you will find a disposition on the part of the people of the old States to relieve themselves from the care of these public lands. I desire to maintain the system as established by our fathers. I desire to maintain it as long as the public lands remain under the steady and unswerving control of the General Government. I desire that the public lands shall not fall into the hands of speculators, who will impose upon the people of the old States when they go to the far West to settle and find new homes. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. CHANDLER. I agree so much with the gentleman who has just taken his seat in his general views that I almost regret the necessity that I feel under of opposing the measure which he has propounded to the House. I think when we are making a distribution of lands that we ought to make it for the good of the whole community, and that we ought to study carefully the means by which we shall equalize it, at least equalize the benefit of the lands. If we give—and I shall vote for giving millions of acres to corporations, that the corporators may thereby profit as well as the land owners in the vicinity; I therefore think that it will be something like equalizing our action and the benefit of our action, if we distribute portions of these lands for the benefit of those who cannot hold railroad scrip, or cannot have anything to invest in that mode of profit.

I go for this bill because it benefits the old States; not because it will depopulate them, as some say. I go for it, not because it is to invite to our shores millions of the paupers of the Old World, but because thousands and millions of those paupers will annually come here, not because invited by us so much as for the cause that they are driven away by those with whom they have lived, and by whom they have been impoverished. I ask some means of outlet by which our Atlantic cities may be freed from this class of citizens, and that their powers to labor and willingness to labor may have something upon which they may be exercised—that the country may benefit by that class of emigration, by their industrious habits, and the returns which the soil shall make for their labor—for the sweat of their brow which will be poured upon it. And therefore I desire, because

I seek equality, to see this democratic element put into the mode of our distribution of the public land, that the country too may share with those who cannot profit by the value of railroad stock, in a part of the profits which it derives from giving away land to corporations; that those who cannot profit there may profit by this mode, while we profit, also, by giving efficacy to their numbers, and make them valuable citizens in our great Commonwealth. We need something by which they can be drawn from our sea-coast—some mode by which they can find encouragement to labor in the West—to be scattered over the country instead of being congregated in masses, and retaining in our cities their national peculiarities—coming across the ocean, changing the heavens, but not changing one grain of their mode of thought, their habit of speech, or the language in which their thoughts are uttered. We need something to Americanize these men, to separate them from the great masses where they are putrifying as they are in our city, bringing a moral evil upon us when they possess within themselves the elements of good. They might be able to promote the benefit of our country by laboring on that unoccupied soil, and reducing it to a state of production for their benefit and for the moral benefit of our own country. Therefore I make this land not an eleemosynary favor—nothing of that kind, sir—but a mode for equalizing our land system by which all parts and all parties may share in its benefits. I will not occupy the attention of the committee further.

Mr. DEAN. I move to strike out one cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the difference between twenty-four and twenty-five cents.

Mr. DEAN. That is a great difference. I am opposed to charging twenty-five cents; and as the Chairman has ruled that I cannot speak except on the difference between twenty-four and twenty-five cents—one cent—I shall reserve the remarks I intended to submit, for some other time. I hope, however, Mr. Chairman, that other gentlemen may be held to the same strictness. I hope that all the constitutional difficulties which gentlemen feel will not be allowed to be stated hereafter on this floor.

[Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. DEAN. If there be no objection, I withdraw my amendment.

There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to propose an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio propose to amend that?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, which is to strike out the words "free of cost," and insert "at twenty-five cents per acre."

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move to amend by adding to the words "free of cost," the words "and that they be provided with one rifle gun each."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the amendment is out of order, it not being germane to the subject.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I move to add, "that they be furnished with one copy of the Constitution of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules still that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is out of order. It is not germane to the subject. The question, is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PECKHAM. I propose to amend by inserting, in the fourth line, after the word "shall" the words "after one year;" which will make the section read, "the citizen of the United States shall, after one year from the passage of this act, be entitled," &c.

I have no great faith, Mr. Chairman, in this bill; but if it be opening a rich vein to the whole country. It seems to me that it would be well enough that the eastern States—the States on the Atlantic—should have opportunities equal to those of the western States for enjoying its benefits. If it be the land of promise, we ought to start fair,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, MARCH 6, 1854.

NEW SERIES...No. 34.

so that we may arrive there at an equal time. There must be a great deal of difference in the value of the different lands in the western country. There undoubtedly is. And it seems to me to be quite rational and proper—and so I offer this amendment in good faith—that in going there the citizen of the Eastern States, on the borders of the Atlantic, shall have equal rights and advantages with those of the West. I trust this will commend itself to the favorable consideration of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Dawson,] and to the justice of those of the West.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the amendment?

Mr. PECKHAM. The amendment is that this bill shall not take effect until after one year from its passage. I have no doubt, nor is it to be doubted, that if the bill is passed as it now stands there are many people at the West who, being right of the spot, will make entries of land at once, within three days after the act is passed—making selections of the best lands, in respect to which they ought to have no advantage.

Mr. DAWSON. And suppose they do? Suppose every man in Illinois, and Indiana, and Wisconsin, and Iowa, and Missouri enters a quarter section, they abstract not a tithe from the aggregate of the public domain.

Mr. PECKHAM. With great respect to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I apprehend that there are people enough in the State of Illinois, who are now ready to enjoy the provisions of the bill, to absorb all the vacant lands in Illinois before the citizens of Pennsylvania or of New York could get fairly under way, and who would thus be compelled to go far beyond that State to get unappropriated lands to settle on.

Mr. DAWSON. There were upwards of four millions of acres of public lands within the limits of the State of Illinois undisposed of on the 30th day of June, 1853.

Mr. PECKHAM. And how many people will go upon the lands there? I am satisfied that there is nothing wrong in this provision; and it seems to me that in all respects it commends itself to the justice of the western people, and gives equality and justice to the people of the East. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. GREY. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Peckham,] and am in favor of this bill, and of its taking effect immediately after its passage. I cannot admit that while we have about fifteen hundred millions acres of unoccupied lands that there is any danger that the people of New York will not get out West in time to get their share. The gentleman proceeds upon the idea suggested by some of the Virginia members on this floor, who suppose that this bill will depopulate all the old States immediately. That cannot be so. Those men who are comfortably situated in the old States will not go to the West for the privilege of obtaining one hundred and sixty acres of land provided they reside upon and cultivate it for five years. But the men in the old States who have no homes—no prospects of a home—and nothing with which to support their families, will accept the offers of the Government held out to them by this bill, and will thereby become tax-paying and independent freeholders. But he who has a home and means of support will not break up the ties which bind him to that home, and all the associations of his life, for the purpose of getting the small amount of one hundred and sixty acres of unimproved lands in the western wilds.

Sir, the gentlemen are mistaken. It will not depopulate Virginia, nor will the western States fill up all the lands now surveyed, and in market, before the pioneers from New York can get out there.

I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment; and also, that all such amendments as that of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Dowdell,] will be voted down by the friends of the bill. I contend that the very best and most valuable consideration which the Government can obtain for the public lands will be the actual settler—the occupant and cultivator of those now wild lands, with his happy and prosperous family located upon them.

The gentleman from Alabama wants to charge the actual settler—the pioneers in the wilderness—fifty cents per acre for those lands. Who has paid for the lands, and who donated them to the Government? The old States. And, sir, the old States paid a larger proportion for those we bought than the land States did. The old States furnished more troops and munitions of war for those acquired by conquest than the land States; and unless you give them, and their citizens, an opportunity, by the provisions of this bill, to obtain their proportion of them, how are they ever to get it?

We find in this House a proposition to give all these lands to the new States for railroad purposes; and we are told that by making that disposition of them, the revenues of the General Government, from the sales of public lands, will be greatly increased.

Now, we have already made donations, amounting to about 140,000,000 acres, to the new States for railroad and other purposes; and how much revenue have we derived from the sale of the public lands during the last fiscal year?

Twenty-five millions of acres have been taken up or located with land warrants. How much of that did the Government sell?—only 1,083,495 acres. The "military bounty land warrants" took up 6,142,360 acres. Other certificates consumed 9,427 acres; while the "swamp land" donations and those for railroads took up 18,111,710 acres. What comes of the argument, then, that by giving the lands to railroads we have increased the revenue of the General Government from the sale of our public lands, when, during the last year, only 1,083,495 acres were sold by the Government out of all this 25,000,000 of acres which were located?

Now, I appeal to the members of this House from the old States, that unless they adopt this bill, which by its provisions secures an opportunity for equal privileges and equal benefits to all, how else can we of the old States obtain any share in those lands, which are the common property of each and all the States of the Union?

The question was then taken upon the amendment proposed by Mr. Peckham, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order. I understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] proposes to strike out that which we have already inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama proposes to strike out the first portion of the bill before the question is taken upon it. The committee have been engaged in perfecting the bill, and in perfecting it have made insertions. When the question is taken upon the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama, if they agree to strike out, they will strike out the first section of the bill as perfected by the committee. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama is in order.

Mr. COBB. I am willing to withdraw my amendment with the consent of the committee, and I hope that it will be voted down, because the committee have already amended the original section so as to cover everything contained in my own amendment. In addition to that, they have provided for the females. I am anxious that they should be provided for; and I am willing, therefore, that the amendment I have offered should be voted down.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Cobb's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, offered the following amendment:

To insert after the enacting clause the following:

That any person who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, and any person who is the head of a family, and has, prior to the time of his making application for the benefit of this act, filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States, in accordance with the law, shall be entitled to settle upon and locate one hundred and sixty acres, to be located in a body, on such public lands as have been surveyed, and which are subject to private entry, at the rate of $1 25 per acre.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. If I understand the gentleman from Illinois, he proposes to strike out the first section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois proposes to strike out the whole section, and insert what has been already read.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I am in favor of the principle of this homestead bill. I think it the true policy of the Government to open its unoccupied lands to actual settlement and cultivation upon the terms as substantially proposed by the bill we are now considering. In perfecting the bill, I hope the committee will take good care not to permit amendments to be made here in the committee of such an unreasonable character that it will fall of its weight in the House, when we come to vote on it there. I hope the friends of the bill will not be drawn off from the object in view by extravagant or irrelevant amendments, but that they will go forward and perfect this bill in the committee, so as to make it as strong as possible. In this view, I have offered the substitute to the first section of the bill, which, I think, will meet the approbation of all who favor the principle of the bill. I will endeavor to state some of the particulars in which my substitute differs from the section in the bill as it has been amended by the committee.

In the first place, I propose to leave it as the honorable chairman of the committee that reported it [Mr. Dawson] left it, so far as it regards its benefits being extended to citizens of the United States. I want every citizen to have the benefit of this act, without regard to the color of his skin. I want no discrimination made against any class of persons; and I think the amendment already made, confining the benefits of the act to free white male citizens, must weaken it, as, to my mind, it is most clearly wrong and unjust. Then, again, I propose that every unnaturalized citizen who has filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen, in accordance to law, before he makes application for the benefit of this act, shall be permitted to avail himself of the provisions of this law. I want as few restrictions as possible; and I would cordially invite the foreigner, as soon as he has landed upon our shores, to make himself a home in our western prairies. Hold out to him the encouraging prospects of this law, and you will soon find him a good citizen, who is turning your profitless and unappropriated lands into a source of national wealth, and adding to the general prosperity of the country.

There is another part of this section which I would call the attention of the committee to, and particularly the gentleman who reported the bill, and I think the propriety of a change of phraseology will be seen. It is now provided that the party who is entitled to the provisions of this act may "enter free of cost" a quarter section of land, &c. Now, sir, that strikes me as a contradiction. What is it to enter a piece of land at a government land office? Why, it is to purchase, to buy, of the Government. That is the meaning of the language, both in law and in the parlance of the land offices, when applied to acquiring land from the United States. All who live in the new States, where Government lands are for sale, know this. You, therefore, by the section as it now stands, propose to let the party who comes within the meaning of this act buy his quarter section of land "free of cost," which is an absurdity and a contradiction. I wish to change that phraseology to something which is appropriate, and which has some fitness; my substitute, therefore, provides for the permission to "locate and settle upon" these unoccupied lands; and then I would further provide, in another part of the bill, that he should be protected by law in his location and settlement until he shall obtain his patent. I think the section which I have offered as a substitute embraces everything which is necessary to make the bill perfect, as far as it can be made perfect. I hope, therefore, that it will be adopted.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am opposed to the amendment, for a reason which I will state to the committee. I presume this bill has been put by the Committee on Agriculture in such a shape as to meet the views of its friends as nearly as it can be made to do so. I do not know that I shall vote for the bill. I expect to vote against it, as I have done against a similar bill at former sessions. But, nevertheless, it has been made the special order, and the committee cannot get it out of the way except by reporting it to the House. I would therefore suggest to gentlemen, as these attempts to amend it will probably not end in much, as we have consumed a great deal of time on the bill already, and as there is important business pressing, that, by general consent, we let it be reported to the House in the form which its friends desire, and vote upon it there without further delay. While I expect to vote against the bill, I think it useless to be throwing in its way these little obstacles, thus consuming a great deal of time when the deficiency bill and other important measures are pressing upon us for action. I trust that, by common consent, we shall let the bill be read through and reported to the House as it now stands, and then we shall all have an opportunity to record our votes as we like.

Mr. LILLY. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That no patent shall issue to any person who is not a citizen of the United States.

My object is to prevent any person coming here—

Mr. DAWSON. That amendment is not all necessary.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey, that what he proposes is provided in another section of the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. No, it is not.

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir, it is. The sixth section of the bill provides that the foreigners enjoying the benefits of the bill shall have become citizens before the issuance of the patents.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Read the sixth section.

Mr. JONES. I hope gentlemen will not throw everything into the first section of the bill. There are other sections, if gentlemen will only read them before they offer amendments, which are not necessary.

Mr. LILLY. I insist on the amendment being made to this section. The object of it is, to prevent persons coming here, declaring an intention to become citizens, taking the land under this bill, and then not completing their naturalization at all. I know a great many foreigners in my part of the country who would be perfectly willing to declare an intention to become citizens for the purpose of obtaining the lands, but who would never become citizens of the United States; and not being citizens, they could never be called on to defend their country, to act as jurors, or to perform any of the other duties of citizenship. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire only to say, that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] is wrong in supposing this amendment to be unnecessary.

Mr. HENN. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is not opposing the amendment. I want to speak in opposition to it.

Mr. DEAN. So do I.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is not in order in speaking in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Well, I certainly do not want to speak in opposition to it.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I want to speak against it.

Mr. JONES. I wish the gentleman from Illinois would just read the sixth section of the bill, which relates entirely to this very point.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I am opposed to the amendment, first, and above all, because I want the bill to pass, and because, having been for a long time a member of this House, I have seen the bill introduced here and killed by its own friends. If the enemies of this bill will keep their seats and say nothing, its friends will kill it themselves. They always have done it; and if they did not do it, they would have no Buncombe measure to run to Congress upon. [A laugh.] Sir, I have heard this cry of "Land for the Landless" and "Homes for the Homeless." Though I have never raised it myself, yet I have been prepared to act on the measure. I am now prepared to act, and I shall manifest my love for "homes for the homeless" and "land for the landless" by going without my dinner this day and sitting here and holding my tongue until the bill passes. Who can make a better Buncombe speech than that? [Laughter.]

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question then recurring on the amendment, it was also disagreed to.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. I move to insert in the fourth line, after the words "United States," "not being the owner of land." It is claimed that this is a bill for the relief of the landless.

Mr. DAWSON. Not at all.

Mr. PERKINS. If it be not designed for the benefit of the poor, and those who are not possessed of land, but to add to the wealth of those who are already landholders, I am opposed to the bill. As it stands, it allows every person who owns a farm, or lot of land, in the States where the public lands lie, to take one hundred and sixty acres. If the provisions of the bill had only for their purpose the donating to the poor the land indicated, and affording them an opportunity to become their own employers, I would support them; but if, on the contrary, they are to enable persons of the western States, who have land, to come in and take another portion adjacent, to the exclusion of the eastern States, I would not.

The men in the eastern States do not want to take this land, except for speculation. If the man at the East be a property holder he cannot leave it and settle in the West; but the western man can go and live on the land adjoining to that which he owns, or put one of his sons upon it, thus making an occupancy of it. This is no equality at all. If the provisions of the bill be confined to those who are poor, and cannot be their own employers, they will be very different from what they are now.

Mr. HENN. I am opposed to the amendment, and ask for a vote on it.

Mr. BISSELL. Is it in order to offer a substitute? I have one which I desire to submit.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to do so.

Mr. BISSELL. I propose, then, to amend the amendment by inserting before the word "land" the words "one hundred and sixty acres of," so that it will read "not being the owner of one hundred and sixty acres of land."

The amendment which I originally intended requires the applicant for the land to file an affidavit that he is not the owner of one hundred and sixty acres of land.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] proposes to insert the words "not being an owner of land," and the gentleman from Illinois proposes to amend by inserting the words "not being an owner of one hundred and sixty acres of land."

Mr. BISSELL. It takes a hundred and sixty acres, according to our notion in the West, to make a good farm; in other words, it takes that quantity of land to make a homestead, and that is the great idea conveyed by this bill. Now, I think there is a great deal of reason and good sense in what the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] says; and there is but one thing which leads me to doubt of its propriety, and that is the opinion expressed by gentlemen on this floor, in whom I have great confidence, adverse to this proposition.

Sir, this bill has been heralded to the country, or, at least, one similar to it, for two, three, four, and five years, as a bill to provide the homeless with homes, to secure land to the landless; and the arguments used in favor of it, and which attach the country so strongly to the measure, were, that it would attach men to the country; that it would create a sense of independence—a desire in men to be the owners of their own homes; that it would attach them to the Government, and make them feel themselves really a part of the Government. Do any of these arguments apply to the man who has already his finely-cultivated farm of a hundred and sixty acres? Most assuredly not? You do not provide homesteads in the proper sense of the word for such men. They have already their homesteads. The title of the bill ought to be changed so as to read "land for those who have plenty of land already; a farm for him who has a dozen of farms now; another home for him who has a home."

I am in favor, most sincerely, of the principles of this bill. I would not do anything to defeat or impede its passage. It is a bill which will benefit the people among whom I live greatly indeed. But I think its effects are extended too far in that respect. I know that gentlemen say "you cannot make that discrimination." Why, you do make that discrimination by this bill now just as effectually as if you had done it by positive words in the act itself. You would necessarily exclude from its provisions all those who are not agriculturists, or who are not prepared to become agriculturists. Therefore the bill, at best, is partial. It must be so. But then I go upon the principle that in this matter, as is so often the case in other matters,

"All partial evil's universal good."

But, sir, the idea of bamboozling the country with the assurance that the bill provides homes for those who have none—and which principle is in conformity with the suggestions of nature, and according to the law of God, as interpreted very correctly, I think, by the gentleman from New York, over the way, [Mr. SMITH]—is utterly absurd. With such arguments, and under the pretensions of accomplishing such objects—to provide for the unfortunate homes, and so forth—under such pretenses, I say, to provide land for him who has already twenty thousand acres in Illinois, and who has not yet determined on what tract to make his house—to provide an additional hundred and sixty acres for him who has another hundred and sixty—seems in controversy to the principles on which I have supported and admired bills of this sort.

At the last session of Congress a bill with similar objects as this passed the House. It excluded from the participation of its benefits those who had a hundred and sixty acres of land. Who ever heard a voice raised in the country against this bill? What newspaper, or what part of the people, made any complaint that it excluded those who are already landowners? In what part of the country was dissatisfaction with the provision of the bill, or with the bill itself, manifested? Nowhere. And the people are now expecting and prepared to receive a bill of a similar kind. Yet without any manifestation from the people that this bill should be changed, without receiving a memorial on the subject from any part of the country, a bill has been introduced, embracing—as well as the poor, the homeless, the houseless, the landless—the richest landowner in the whole country.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am opposed to the amendment to the amendment, because, sir, it is in direct conflict with one of my chief political tenets. It proposes to make a discrimination between citizens of this country. I am not one of those who come here to advocate, nor do I elsewhere advocate, the peculiar rights of the poor by giving them bounties. But, sir, I do here and elsewhere oppose all propositions which seem to me to be calculated or intended to make distinctions or to legislate for a class. I am not an advocate for poor man's laws other than to prevent cormorant wealth from devouring them; but I am an advocate for equal laws, such as will inure to the benefit of the poor man and the rich man alike.

I do not support this bill upon the ground that it will give homes and houses to the houseless and the landless; but I support it as a sheer act of justice to the pioneer who penetrates the wilderness, and settles the wild lands of our country. I am convinced, sir, from the little experience I have upon the subject, that the earlier and the first settlers of a new country, though you give them a quarter section of land, pay dearer for it, in the hardships, privations, and toils incident to such settlements, than those who come afterwards with pockets full of gold, and take up these lands and pay fifty or a hundred dollars for them. I vote for it because it is equal to American citizens who think proper to avail themselves of its privileges.

A word as to the constitutional question. Your $1 25 per acre fixed by Congress is as arbitrary a price as if you had said only one mill; and I ask my particular friend from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON], who is so opposed to this bill for want of conformity to the Constitution—nay, I appeal to all my friends from Virginia—to tell me what became of their constitutional scruples when they voted for the act of September 28, 1850, to give bounty lands to soldiers who had rendered services forty and sixty years before, and had been settled with and paid off, and who had not one iota of claim against the Government? You gave them a gratuity under the act of September, 1850, and I find, upon consulting the records, that twelve members from Virginia recorded their votes in favor of that bill. They also voted in favor of the swamp land bill. That was as much a gratuity, as purely a gratuity, as is proposed by this bill. And, sir, there has been more land appropriated under that bounty land bill than there will be under this bill, if you pass it, for the next ten or fifteen years.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope the friends of the bill will not vote for the motion.

The question was then taken; and, a division being had, there were—ayes 62, noes 59.

Mr. DEAN demanded tellers, which were ordered; and Messrs. DAWSON and WESTBROOK were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, noes not counted.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and, by special order, House bill No. 37, commonly known as the homestead bill, but had come to no resolution thereon.

On motion by Mr. LETCHER, the House then adjourned till to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 3, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to present a report of the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 5th January last, requesting a statement of the amount of money received and expended by Luther Blake, late agent for the removal of the Indians from Florida, as such agent, with the objects for which it was expended, and the number of Indians removed by him.

The report was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETER PONCIN.

Mr. PETTIT. This being private bill day, I have a number of little bills that hang on me and their friends like an incubus, which I would like to have taken up and considered. They are plain matters, which will lead to no debate. I suppose we shall go on with private business until one o'clock. I hope that we may have an hour, if necessary, to pass private bills before we take up the Nebraska bill. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill authorizing a patent to be issued to Peter Poncin for certain lands therein named. Its passage is recommended in the strongest and most positive terms by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and no objection can be made to it. It relates to a small tract of land in Minnesota.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It proposes to direct the entry by Peter Poncin of the north half of the southeast quarter, and the south half of the northeast quarter, of section thirty-six, in township twenty-nine, range twenty-three, in the Stillwater land district, Minnesota, and canceled by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to be allowed and reinstated, so that the title may inure to the benefit of his grantees, as far as he may have conveyed it, with the proviso, however, that the money paid shall not be withdrawn, or if withdrawn, shall be again paid to the Land Office, and that thereupon a patent shall issue in his name. It also authorizes the Superintendent of Public Schools in Minnesota to select other lands, in lieu of those in section thirty-six, as far as they may have been granted or sold.

Mr. PETTIT. There is a printed report accompanying the bill, but there can be no necessity for reading it.

No amendment being proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

CONRAD WHEAT, JR.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President, there is one more bill which I ask the Senate to consider, and which will take no longer time than the other did. If it be passed, I shall be rid of a good deal of trouble. I move that the Senate take up the bill "for the relief of Conrad Wheat, jr., or his legal representatives." It is recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and is accompanied by a printed report, which any gentleman can have read, if he desires.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to confirm to Conrad Wheat, jr., the location of six hundred and forty acres of land described as survey No. 2453, in township forty-four north, of ranges five and six east of the principal meridian in the State of Missouri, made by him on the 22d of October, 1816, under a certificate of location No. 113, issued on the 12th of August, 1816, by the recorder of land titles.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

SAMUEL PRIOLEAU.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, as there seems to be a little leisure in the Senate this morning, I ask them to take up the bill "for the relief of the legal representatives of Samuel Prioleau," which was reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. I think it will not meet with any objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers to pay to Mr. Prioleau's legal representatives the sum of $6,928 60, being in full compensation for property taken from him at Charleston for the use of the United States, during the revolutionary war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

SUSPENSION OF RULE.

On the motion of Mr. BADGER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, of which he gave notice yesterday:

Resolved, That the resolution assigning every Friday for the consideration of private bills be suspended for this day.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, I do not intend to ask the sense of the Senate upon this resolution; but inasmuch as I said something a short time ago respecting it, I beg leave merely to say now, that I do not wish to be understood as giving my assent to this proposition. The only reason which I desire to assign for this course, is, that so long as the Government of the United States refuses to establish any other tribunal, or to pass any law by which private claims can be adjusted otherwise than by Congress, I cannot, with my views of propriety, refuse to appropriate one day in a week to adjust and settle them; and but for the fact that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] desires to address the Senate to-day, he having the floor awarded to him upon the Nebraska bill, I should feel constrained, for the reason which I have assigned, to ask for the sense of the Senate upon it; as it is, I only wished to express my views against the proposition.

The resolution was agreed to.

PETITIONS.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a memorial of citizens of New Sharon, Maine, protesting against the admission of slavery into the Territories now or at any future time; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FOOT presented a remonstrance of one hundred and twenty citizens of Stowe, Vermont, against the passage of the Nebraska bill in its present form; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, the proceedings of a public meeting held at Burlington, Vermont, in opposition to the passage of the Nebraska bill in its present form; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of Andrew Boileau, one of the relatives and legal representatives of Lieutenant Pierre Boileau, a revolutionary officer, praying for commutation under the resolves of Congress of October 21, 1780, and March 22, 1783; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition of citizens of Sandwich, Massachusetts, praying that buoys may be placed at certain places in the New Bedford collection district; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of the Bowdoin Quarterly Meeting of Free-will Baptists, held at Topsham, Maine, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas without a prohibition of slavery therein; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the memorial of A. W. Bowman, an officer of the Army, praying compensation for performing duties of an extraordinary character, and out of the line of his duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of A. J. M. Smith and others, remonstrating against the extension of the area of slavery; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, four petitions of citizens of Ontario county, New York, remonstrating against an infringement of the Missouri compromise; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, four petitions of citizens of Orleans county, New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and against the extension of slavery into the Territories of the United States; which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill granting to the States of Indiana and Illinois a portion of the public lands to aid in the construction of the Indiana and Illinois Central railway, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of J. K. Cooke, praying remuneration for loss of time and expenses incurred under an appointment of the President as Consul of the United States at Xebara, in the Island of Cuba, the Governor General of that island having refused to recognize him as such, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska was read a third time.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. CASS. The honorable Senator from Tennessee has been kind enough to allow me to occupy the floor for a moment. I was not here last night when the vote was taken upon the engrossment of the bill. I desire to record my vote in favor of its final passage; and therefore I will ask the Senate to indulge me in ordering the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I deem it due to Senators to state that I announced last night, before we proceeded to the vote, that several of our friends, from indisposition, had been compelled to leave the Senate, under the impression that the vote would not be taken, and consequently that I should record the test question as being on the passage of the bill, rather than on the engrossment.

Mr. CASS. The honorable Senator mentioned to me last night that he had no idea that the vote would then be taken on the engrossment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. For that reason I thought it proper to make the statement which I have mentioned.

Mr. CASS. I wish to express my gratification at the adoption of the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] and my thanks to him for it. Although it is an act of justice which I believe almost every Senator from the South who had touched upon the subject agreed to, it is no less an act of conciliation which will be very acceptable to the North, and remove many objections to the bill, and I trust it will be an example to be followed hereafter. I believe myself that the passage of this bill with that provision will close the fountain of the bitter waters of agitation. Having said this,

I ask for the yeas and nays upon the question of the final passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BELL addressed the Senate at some length on the general subject connected with this bill.

The debate was continued by Messrs. DAWSON, NORRIS, WADE, PETTIT, TOUCHEY, FESSENDEN, WELLER, DOUGLAS, and HOUSTON.

Mr. HOUSTON concluded at ten minutes to five o'clock, a. m.

[This debate will be found in the Appendix.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, in the chair.) The question is on the passage of the bill, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have been requested to make a statement to the Senate, which, perhaps, should be made now. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] as is well known, has been very sick and confined to his lodgings for some weeks. He came here to-day and remained some hours, with the desire to vote upon this bill. He was, however, unable to remain longer, and was taken back to his house, with the intention to return if possible when the vote was taken; but he was compelled to take to his bed seriously ill. He sent a request to me that I would state these circumstances to the Senate, and add, that if he could have been here, he would have voted for the bill.

Mr. CASS. That will not go on the Journal.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, but it will go into the report of the proceedings. I have further to state, that the Senator from Florida, [Mr. MALLORY,] also, was anxious to vote for the bill, but he had to leave the city on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. JAMES. My colleague, [Mr. ALLEN,] as is known to most of the Senators, has been called home on account of the sickness of his son. Before leaving, he requested me to state to the Senate, in case the vote should be taken while he was away, that under the circumstances of the case he should feel compelled to vote against the bill.

Mr. DAWSON. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. TOOMBS] is unable, from indisposition, to be here. If he had been here, he would have voted for the bill.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted—yeas 37, nays 14.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Benjamin, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Cass, Clay, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Gwin, Hunter, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Morton, Norris, Pettit, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Shields, Slidell, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toucey, Weller, and Williams—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Hamlin, Houston, James, Seward, Smith, Sumner, Wade, and Walker—14.

So the bill was passed.

On the motion of Mr. DOUGLAS, its title was amended, so as to read: "A bill to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas."

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BADGER. I think that the Senate, after this protracted sitting, is entitled to a rest of three days. I therefore move that when the Senate adjourn, it be to meet on Tuesday next.

Several SENATORS. Agreed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate, then, at five minutes to five o'clock on Saturday morning, after a continuous session of seventeen hours, adjourned to Tuesday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 3, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of the 22d December, a plan, by the Attorney General, for the modification and enlargement of the judicial system of the United States, in accordance with the recommendations in his late annual message; which was read, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the President, in reply to a resolution of the House, of the 13th ultimo, asking information in respect to the negotiations with the Government of Peru, with reference to the exportation of guano, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State, with the correspondence referred to; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

OLD SOLDIERS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a communication from the Governor of Pennsylvania, containing resolutions relative to the old soldiers, with a view of having it referred.

There was no objection, and the letter and resolutions were read by the Clerk, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

The resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania provide:

First, that the Senators from that State be instructed, and their Representatives requested, to use their influence and vote for the passage of an act granting to each soldier one hundred and sixty acres of public lands, in accordance with the request as published at the convention of soldiers lately held in the city of Philadelphia.

Second, that, in their opinion, the Government of the United States should extend to the soldiers, and widows of soldiers, that remain of those who served in the last war with Great Britain, the benefits of the pension system that was created for, and enjoyed by, the soldiers and widows of the Revolution.

Third, that the Governor be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing resolutions to each of our Senators and members of Congress, and to each of the Governors of the several States.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I desire to know what became of the communication from the President of the United States with reference to modifications of our judicial system?

The SPEAKER. It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DEAN. Before the question is put upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EDGERTON,] I desire to ask if this is not objection Friday?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DEAN. Now, I want to know if any bills have been added to the Private Calendar since it was gone through with on last Friday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that all the bills now upon the Private Calendar were objected to on the last objection day. This is objection day, and the Chair merely states the fact as a matter of information.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask that the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House may be withdrawn for a moment, to allow me to present a communication from the Governor of Pennsylvania, transmitting certain resolutions from that State in regard to an extension of the bounty land system.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That communication has just been presented by the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. CHANDLER,] and read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. FLORENCE. It has not been presented by me. I ask the consent of the House to present it, have it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES. There is surely no necessity of having it printed twice.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, sir, I have special charge of this subject, and I hope the gentleman will indulge me in my request. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. The communication has already been presented, read, and ordered to be printed. I object to its being printed again.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the communication cannot be disposed of as indicated.

Mr. ORR, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial from Lieutenant Maury, in behalf of the Memphis convention, in favor of the free navigation of the Amazon river; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDGERTON. At the request of gentlemen around me, I withdraw my motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House.

The question recurring upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ORR in the chair.)

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, they had under consideration special order of the House, being House bill (No. 37) "to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified."

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PECKHAM] offered an amendment, to insert in the fourth line of the first section, after the words "United States," the words "not being the owner of lands." The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSSELL] proposed to amend the amendment by inserting before the word "lands" the words "one hundred and sixty acres;" and the question pending is upon the latter amendment.

The question was put; and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLSON. I move to amend the amendment, by inserting at the end thereof the words "and who shall have received, or who may hereafter receive, bounty lands under any act of Congress."

The committee will perceive that I have only moved that amendment for the purpose of replying, in order, to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] and with a view of responding to the inquiry which has been addressed to me by him. As I was not then in my seat, I had no opportunity to reply to it.

The gentleman asked me what became of my constitutional objections when I voted for the bounty land bill of 1850? Why, sir, if the gentleman imputes that vote to me as a fault, I can only say that the gentleman from Tennessee himself was one of a very large number who voted to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing that very bill; the gentleman from Tennessee himself was one of a very large number who voted to suspend the rules for the purpose of making the bounty land bill a special order, and I was one of a very small number who voted against suspending the rules for that purpose; and the gentleman from Tennessee and myself had the pleasure to unite in the vote that was afterwards given in favor of the passage of that bill. Why then, all I have to say, is, that if my friend from Tennessee—and I am very happy to hail him as my particular friend—censures the vote which I then gave, I think I can shelter myself under the authority of so able a constitutional lawyer as he is. I take particular pleasure in defending the vote which I then gave, because in defending myself I defend him, and I should be exceedingly sorry if his reputation should suffer any disparagement here from his own attack upon himself. Regarding him, as I do, as a most experienced, able, and valuable member of this House, I should regret almost as much as he could do, anything that would throw any imputation upon the character he has so well earned.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It certainly was not my intention, in the reference which I made to the vote on the bounty land bill of 1850, to arraign the gentleman from Virginia, who, I am most happy to say, I esteem as one of my most particular personal and political friends. But, sir, it was to elicit from that gentleman, who has clear and correct conceptions, I think, of the Constitution, what is the difference, upon the constitutional question, between voting for this homestead bill and voting for the bounty land bill of 1850? The object of that bill was to give lands to soldiers who had served in the war of 1812, and the Indian wars since 1790; this bill was not originated, nor has it been advocated.

Mr. ORR. The gentleman from Tennessee adheres to the rules very closely generally; but I think he is departing from them now, and I call him to order.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will wait a little he will find that I am not out of order now.

The CHAIRMAN. Although the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] offered an amendment for the purpose of making a speech in order, the remarks which he made were really not in order, and the remarks which the gentleman from Tennessee is now making are not in order.

Mr. JONES. I am speaking on the constitutionality of the gentleman's amendment, and the bill to which it is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to speak on the constitutionality of the amendment. That is in order.

Mr. MILLSON. And that is precisely what I was doing.

Mr. JONES. The bounty land bill of 1850 was as much a gratuity as this is. The Government had settled with every soldier provided for by that bill, and had paid him to the last cent that it owed him, and it was purely and solely a gratuity; and this is fixed on a consideration of settlement and cultivation; and, sir, I cannot for my life see the difference between the two as to constitutionality. My friend did not touch that question.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York, obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment to the amendment. When it has been voted on amendments will then be in order.

Mr. MILLSON. With the unanimous consent of the committee I shall withdraw my amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. PERKINS, of New York, submitted yesterday, and it was disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no further amendment to the first section the Clerk will read the second one.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will it be in order to move to strike out the first section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain that motion, although the Clerk was about to read the second section, the committee having proceeded from the first.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suggest that it is not in order to move to strike out the first section. To strike out the first section would be to reject the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the striking out of the enacting clause would be equivalent to a rejection of a bill. To move to strike out the first section after the enacting clause to the bill is in order.

Mr. JONES. That, I hold, would be a rejection of the bill. The remaining sections regulate only the details of the manner in which the first section is to be carried into effect. That would be a rejection of the bill, and the committee has not the right to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that to strike out the first section of the bill, after the enacting clause, is equivalent to a rejection of the bill. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama is in order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to strike out the first section, Mr. Chairman, because I am opposed to the principle on which the bill is founded; and in the beginning I state that I fully admit the constitutional power of Government over these lands as property. I know of no wider and larger term than the word "dispose," which is used in the Constitution; and that word, "dispose," equally applies to the donation of lands as to their sale. I admit, therefore, the full constitutional power of the Government over the disposition of the public land as the property of the country.

At the same time, sir, I am opposed to the principle of the bill. I am opposed to it because it works a complete revolution in the legislation of this country heretofore had on the subject of our public land. I am opposed to it because it destroys all the past action of this Government in regard to those lands. It destroys, in a great measure, the value of the grants of the public land to the States. It depreciates to a great degree the value of those very bounties of land which have been given for military services rendered to the country, millions of acres of which are yet uncultivated. It goes further, and depreciates the value of those very lands which you have sold to actual purchasers, and who have paid their money into your coffers. It does all this. It reverses your legislation on the subject of the public lands.

I am opposed to it, sir, on another principle. It is said that this bill is to give homes to the homeless and land to the landless. I deny that that is any part or parcel of the powers that have been intrusted to the Federal Government. We have no right to constitute ourselves the great almoners of this country, and to give homes to the homeless and lands to the landless. That is no part of our system, that is no part of our duty.

Sir, it is said, on the other hand, that this is not the object of the bill, but that the object is to settle up your western country. I admit, Mr. Chairman, that it is our duty to afford facilities to those who choose to settle up that country. But I deny that it is any part of the power or policy of this Government to give bounties or afford stimulants to the settlement of that country. What is the great evil under which many of these States are now laboring? The great evil exists in the unsettled and migratory character of our population.

What are we doing at the present moment in many of our States, especially in the southwestern States? We are making railroads; we are instituting systems of internal improvement, so as to hold out inducements to our people to remain at home. The great evil that now exists is this, that it is easier to purchase new lands than to manure and protect old lands. That is the evil under which we are now suffering. At their present prices the cheapness of the public lands has already made it a part of the history of the country, and of the practice of the country, that it is cheaper to purchase new lands, and to give up worn out lands, than it is to remain at home and manure and protect them.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, and to all other amendments, and I hope it will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the second section of the bill.

The second section of the bill was accordingly read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The first proviso of the second section is as follows:

"Provided, however, That no certificate shall be given, or patent issued therefor, until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry; and if, at the expiration of such time, the person making such entry, or, if he be dead, his widow, or, in case of her death, his heirs or devisees, or, in case of a widow making such entry, her heirs or devisees, in case of her death, shall prove by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they, have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land, and still reside upon the same, and have not alienated the same, or any part thereof; then, in such case, he, she, or they shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided for by law."

I propose to amend the same by adding the following further proviso:

"Provided, further, That at any time after the expiration of one year from the date of such entry the person who would be entitled to a patent if said term of five years were then expired, may pay the United States the sum of twenty-five cents per acre, and thereupon shall be entitled to a patent for said land.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from Indiana, before he presses his amendment, to allow me to offer an amendment which should properly precede his.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JONES. My amendment is designed to make this section conform to the first section of the bill, as amended by the House. It is to insert, after the word "family," in the fifth line, the words "or over the age of twenty-one years," so that it shall read:

"That the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, upon application to the register of the land office in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the said register that he or she is the head of a family, or over the age of twenty-one years; and upon making the affidavit as above required, and filing the affidavit with the register, he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the quantity of land already specified."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I now ask that my amendment may be read again.

The amendment was accordingly read, as above inserted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am in favor of giving lands upon easy terms to actual settlers. But I do not think the plan proposed in the bill is the best that could be adopted. It is not the most favorable to the settler, or to the Government. Under the provisions of the bill, the settler must make his location, and continue to reside upon and cultivate the land for five years, without a title; the title, in the mean time, remaining in the Government. During these five years he is but the tenant of the Government. Without being the owner, he is required to spend his labor and money in the improvement of the land. And it matters not what changes in his fortune and circumstances may make him dissatisfied with his location, or render it impossible for him to continue it for the five years, if he abandons his location he loses all; the land, with the improvements, returns to the Government. During this term of five years he has no estate in the lands, or in the fields he may have cleared, or the houses he may have built, which he can sell to another. He cannot labor with the same confidence and earnestness that he would if he had the patent in his pocket.

I cannot present the objections to any system that would make the people tenants of the land under the Government with the power and elegance displayed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Dawson,] in his very able speech in favor of this bill. I will support the bill, but I feel that the objections to which I have referred are weighty, and to obviate them, as far as possible, I offer the amendment. This amendment is based upon the principle that the lands should be given by the Government to the people, in limited quantities, for homes, at the cost price, and that the title should be secured at once. In his report of 1850, and also in his report made during the present session of Congress, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shows, that the lands in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin, Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Tennessee, and the Territory of Minnesota, cost the Government, including the cost of selling and managing, not quite twenty-two cents per acre. In his report of 1850, the Commissioner says:

"The average cost to the Government of acquiring title to the public lands, including the extinguishment of the Indian title, is.....	cents 14.41, per acre.
Cost of survey.....	2.07
Cost of selling and managing.....	5.32
Total average cost.....	21.80

While for each acre sold the Government gets $1 25, or a net profit, over and above every cost and expense, $1 03 1-5 per acre."

Sir, the land does not cost the Government twenty-five cents per acre, but I propose that the settler pay at that rate. The quarter section will cost him forty dollars. The amendment requires that he shall establish that he is a settler in good faith, by a residence of one year upon the land. He may then pay the forty dollars, and receive his patent at once. He is no longer a tenant of the Government, but a freeholder. He is then secure in the money and labor expended, and will work with a good will.

In most cases, sir, the settler will prefer paying this small sum, and taking his title at once. The Government will be reimbursed. No wrong will be done to any section of the Union.

With this amendment, this bill, in my judgment, will be one of the great and beneficent measures of this day. Under its provisions the men of the country who wish to secure homes may make their location, maintain it for one year, pay to the Government forty dollars, and become freeholders; and those who cannot pay that amount may continue their residence upon and cultivation of the land for the five years, and then receive their title. Then all may have homes.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not intend to answer all the objections, or to consume time in discussing all the amendments that may be offered to this bill. I would merely suggest that this amendment, if adopted, will practically result in the graduation of the public lands. It will defeat, in a great measure, the main object of the bill, which is the settlement and cultivation of the public domain. It will, in fact, open up a new field for speculation, destroy settlements by holding out inducements to the settler to dispose of his title, which he can do by paying one quarter of a dollar per acre at the land office. A new settlement would then follow, thus delaying valuable and permanent improvements, the result of which will be practically to defeat the great object which this bill has in view.

The question was then taken upon Mr. HENDRICK's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MATTESON. I offer the following amendment:

Insert after the word "affidavit" in the fourth line of the second section the words "and procure the affidavit of two disinterested freeholders to be made."

By this bill, all that any white man—or woman, perhaps, I ought to say—has to do to get one hundred and sixty acres of land is simply to make his affidavit. That is not enough, in my opinion, and is altogether too cheap. It is not such a form as I think ought to be prescribed in case a man desires to secure a farm. We all know the facility with which men often make affidavits for a much smaller consideration than that of obtaining a farm.

We all know, under the laws of all the States, the formality required in recording and transmitting title to real estate. I insist, that if one hundred and sixty acres of land are worth having at all, that something more than the simple affidavit of any one man who desires such a farm should be required. Gentlemen who have had any experience in the courts know very well the facility with which affidavits are sometimes made. It is no hardship, it strikes me, if any one desires to avail himself of the benefits of this act, that in addition to making his own affidavit he should procure the affidavit of two freeholders, his neighbors, that he is the person described in his own affidavit. I think this requirement would prove no hardship at all, but it would be a guard thrown around this bill, and highly necessary to protect the interests of the Government.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I propose to answer the objection just made by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MATTESON], to the provision in the bill now under consideration. It seems to me that the gentleman has entirely misapprehended the express terms of this bill. He starts out with the objection, that it is quite too cheap to get a quarter section by filing an affidavit.

I grant that these lands may be too cheap, but sir, the person proposing to enter them does not get his quarter section upon these terms; on the contrary, before he can obtain his title to the land from the Government, the section already requires that he shall do precisely what the gentleman proposes. It renders it tautological, at any rate, and therefore objectionable, to insert this amendment. And not only this, but it is utterly useless, from the fact that the section already provides for the self-same thing. In the latter part of this section is the following clause:

"And if, at the expiration of such time, the person making such entry, or, if he be dead, his widow, or, in case of her death, his heirs or devisee, or, in case of a widow making such entry, her heirs or devisee, in case of her death, shall prove by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they, have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land, and still reside upon the same, and have not alienated the same, or any part thereof; then, in such case, he, she, or they, shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided for by law."

Now, if I do not entirely misapprehend the language of this clause of the bill, there is therein contained a provision precisely the same as that contemplated by the amendment proposed. That is the meaning of the section, it seems to me, if it means anything. I desire, however, to be corrected if I have misapprehended it.

Mr. BISSELL. It strikes me that the affidavit provided for in the second section should be made to conform with that already inserted in the first. If I recollect rightly, we have adopted such an amendment to the first section, and, if so, the second should be made to correspond.

The CHAIRMAN. No further discussion is in order. Does the gentleman from Illinois propose an amendment?

Mr. BISSELL. No, sir; upon further consideration I will not propose any amendment.

The question was then taken upon Mr. MATTESON's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I now propose an amendment to this section of the bill. I do it in order to make it as perfect as possible. I move to insert after the word "lands," in the sixteenth line, the following words: "and have made lasting and valuable improvements thereon, and have not committed waste upon the adjoining lands."

This provision should be also embraced in the affidavit and subject to proof, and I have offered it for this reason. One of the prominent features of this bill which recommends it to the majority of this House and the country, is found, I believe, in the last section, which proposes to make these donations in alternate quarter sections. I have resided in the West for twenty-one years; I have seen a new country settled, and I know very well the benefit which this bill will secure to the poor laboring population of the country. The nation cannot better dispose of her public domain than, by the provisions of this bill, to secure its settlement by an industrious yeomanry.

But, sir, while such are the beneficial results of this bill, there are objections to it in its present form. It needs this additional guard. Living as long as I have done in the West, and having seen a new country settled, I have also seen the disposition, on the part of a large portion of those who go upon the frontier, to squat themselves down, and simply to subsist, from day to day, and from year to year, and perhaps for the length of time contemplated in this bill, by plundering upon the adjoining lands, more especially in those portions of the country where timber is scarce, and hence valuable. It is indispensably necessary to guard this bill by an amendment, such as I have offered, in order to obviate that radical objection to it.

Mr. DAWSON. The laws of the country give ample protection against such trespasses, and it is unnecessary to incorporate them into this bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have been a resident in the West—

[Cries of "Order."]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana having addressed the committee once and resigned the floor cannot speak again upon his amendment.

The question was then taken on Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. LINDLEY. I offer the following amendment:

Add at the end of the second section this proviso:

And provided further, That any person, being a citizen of the United States, and the head of a family, who shall be the owner of a tract of less than one hundred and sixty acres of land in any district of public lands shall be entitled to enter, free of cost, so much of the public lands adjoining, or as near thereto as may be, as will, when added to the same, amount to one hundred and sixty acres; and at the expiration of five years from the date of said entry, if the person making the same, his widow, heirs, or devisees, as the case may be, shall prove that he, she, or they have continued to reside upon and cultivate said tract of land so previously owned, or so entered, or any part thereof; then, in such case, he, she, or they shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided for by law.

I desire to make a few remarks in explanation of that amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order. Has not that same proposition already been voted down?

The CHAIRMAN. Not in the same words; it was a different proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. It was the same horse, only of a different color.

Mr. LINDLEY. The gentleman is mistaken; there has been nothing of this kind offered as an amendment, nor anything like it. The object of my amendment is to extend the benefits of this bill to a large and meritorious class of the citizens of the West, without, at the same time, requiring them to sacrifice more than would counterbalance the benefits proposed to be conferred by the bill. There are a great many people in the western country who removed there at an early day, and have succeeded, by hard labor and toil, in securing the title to forty or eighty acres, and the cultivation of that land, the fencing, breaking, and putting upon it the improvements usual in the western country, will amount to more than the value of the land.

The object of this amendment is to enable those persons to enter, under the provisions of this bill, as much land adjoining their own, or as near thereto as may be, as will make them equal with the settler from the old States who may locate immediately beside them. When an individual has forty acres, for instance, which he has raised money to enter, and has placed improvements upon it, I desire that he may be permitted to enter, free of cost, other three forties adjoining, or as near as may be, without being compelled to sell or remove from his improvements.

The cost of his improvements is more than the value of the land; and the improvements of which I speak are generally so small that persons coming to the West at this time to purchase improved farms will not buy them; consequently the owner of that land has no market, and cannot sell the little forty acres in order to take advantage of the provisions of this bill; and if you require him to remove from his forty acres to go on the public land, it would be to demand of him a great sacrifice. He cannot sell or remove from it without sacrificing more than is proposed to be given him by the provisions of the bill.

The bill requires that the person shall reside on the one hundred and sixty acres which he enters under its provisions. My amendment proposes that he may reside on the tract of land which he has previously entered, and enter, free of cost, as much more as will amount in all to one hundred and sixty acres. It is nothing but fair and right to those men who emigrated to the West years ago, when the country was very wild, and endured all the privations of poverty, and the hardships of frontier life, to place them thus within the provisions of the bill. Being actual settlers, they should not be deprived of the right which you propose to extend to individuals who have never been in the West, and who are now living in the East, or may come from a foreign land.

Adopt this amendment, and you will then carry out fully the object of the bill, and do justice to the actual settler.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I think the gentleman's amendment makes the bill more objectionable to me, and therefore I am opposed to it.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. Is it in order to offer an additional section to the bill at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. That is only in order when all the sections of the bill have been gone through with.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I have been confined to my room for several days past. I have only been able to get here to-day, and would like to have the indulgence of the committee to offer my amendment to the bill as soon as may be.

[Cries of "Offer it now!"]

The unanimous consent of the committee was given to the submission of the amendment.

Mr. HENN. Has the second section been disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not. Indulgence has been extended to the gentleman from Tennessee, in consequence of his indisposition, to offer his amendment at this time.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I move the following as an additional section to the bill:

SEC.—And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall never be held or deemed to apply to any person or persons, except native-born citizens of the United States, and such other persons as are now naturalized, and to such other person or persons as, at the time of the passage of this act, shall have filed their declaration of intention to become naturalized citizens according to existing laws regulating the mode and manner of naturalizing foreigners, and to no other person or persons whomsoever.

Mr. Chairman, the committee will doubtless indulge me but one moment, while I explain the object of my amendment. I am willing to provide for the natural-born American citizens; I am willing to provide for those who have come here, and show their devotion to our country and its institutions by becoming naturalized; but I am unwilling to offer that which may be construed into a bribe to invite from all parts of the world every variety of population, and that, too, by offering them a bounty which has never been offered to you or me, or those who have preceded us. We must stop somewhere.

It is well known that in Europe a man having a hundred and sixty acres of land is regarded as a large proprietor; and if the news goes forth to Europe, and to Asia, and to all parts of the world, that in this country we give a hundred and sixty acres of the public domain to American citizens, to naturalized foreigners, and to those who may come here and become naturalized, they will instantly bridge the Atlantic and the Pacific, and in ten years your public domain will be swallowed up. Swallowed up, sir, and by whom? By those who, I fear, may some day change our laws, our institutions, and even, perhaps, our religion.

Already you have a colony here—I mean the Territory of Utah—in which you have what we denounce as a spurious religion. You have there polygamy in all its forms, in all its consequences. And that colony is made up, as we all know, by the immigration from Europe of those who there embrace the peculiar doctrines of the Latter Day Saints.

Now, sir, I have no objection that the benefits of the bill should extend to every native-born American citizen, to those who have been naturalized, and to those who have already declared their intention of becoming American citizens, without the offer of this bounty. I do not know that patriotism, or duty, or interest require us to go further than that, and to offer this inducement to every variety of persons, without reference almost to color. I say we ought not to do it. Let us confine the benefits of this bill to those who are American citizens, who have been naturalized, or who have declared their intention to become so. The bill in its present form gives land to American and to naturalized citizens. It is idle to say that the foreigner who comes here and settles on the public domain and becomes naturalized is not an American citizen within the meaning of this bill, and is not entitled to the benefits of this act.

I have felt it my duty, Mr. Chairman, to offer this amendment, but I am told by a friend on my right that it is unnecessary, as the bill applies only to American citizens, and to those who are now naturalized, and now residents of the United States. If that be so, my amendment can do no harm. I differ with the gentleman as to the legal construction of the bill. Let my amendment go forth with the bill, as a sort of warning and admonition to all the world that they need not come here expecting these privileges from the Government of the United States. Such an amendment, at all events, can do no harm.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ETHERIDGE] read.

The Clerk reported the amendment again.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I do not concur, Mr. Chairman, in the amendment, and therefore I shall oppose it. I do not apprehend the evils which are anticipated by the gentleman who submitted it. I think it is obviously unjust to cut off from the benefits of this bill that large class who, immediately on coming here, become naturalized citizens—assimilate with our institutions, constitute, in every element, the good citizen; not subordinate in usefulness, not subordinate in fidelity, not subordinate in any respect to American born citizens. It is to be understood and borne in mind that one fifth of the population of this country are foreigners or are immediately descended from foreigners. And I submit the question, whether, in any exigency, the naturalized foreigner, or the descendant of the foreigner, has not been equal, in all emergencies, to the American born citizen?

Therefore I resist the amendment, as the bill would be doing injustice, if this amendment prevail. I understand the provisions of this bill to be to promote the very purposes to which the gentleman objects; that is, to invite immigration, to people our western frontiers, to cultivate the waste lands, and to bring into use those vast acres in the west. For that reason, I shall resist the amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ETHERIDGE.]

Mr. NORTON. I am opposed to that amendment.

Mr. ORR, (interrupting.) I would suggest to the gentleman whether it would not be better to consider and perfect the second section, which is now under consideration, before we proceed to the further consideration of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee?

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. ORR. I suggest to the committee that it would be better to postpone that amendment until after we have perfected the second section of the bill. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ETHERIDGE] has made his remarks, and I can see no objection to the postponement of its consideration until the time I have suggested.

A VOICE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. NORTON] will proceed.

Mr. NORTON. I offer the following amendment:

That the provisions of this bill shall also apply to all persons who shall have, at the time of making application for the benefits thereof, made their declaration of intention to become citizens of the United States, according to the laws of the United States.

I offer this amendment as a substitute for that offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ETHERIDGE.] Now, sir, I am in favor of the provisions of this bill, and I shall vote for it. I am in favor of the provisions of this bill, because I believe that is a good manner of disposing of a portion of the public lands. It will add new inducements to emigration from the old States to the new States and Territories. It will offer an inducement to large numbers of the poorer classes, now dragging out a miserable existence in the large towns and cities of the old States, to emigrate to and settle upon our western prairies, for the purpose of bettering their own condition, and furnishing to their children facilities for education and improvement which they are now denied. They will thus be enabled to present their country with a generation of men and women far better fitted for the high duties of American citizens. It will promote the cause of general education; it will facilitate the settlement and improvement of the country; it will develop its resources, and increase its wealth. It will raise the standard of respectability amongst a large portion of the toiling millions of our fellow-men, now laboring under grievous disabilities and disadvantages; it will hold out new incentives to morality, industry, and economy. It will tend, at least in some degree, to the establishment of that equality amongst men which is the pride and boast of our institutions, and the foundation of our Government. I believe, sir, that every acre of land, and every dollar of money, that this Government can devote to the elevation of those in the humbler walks of life in the scale of being are well expended. I believe that the passage of this bill will be conducive to the highest interests of the country—moral, educational, and pecuniary.

Now, sir, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, for this reason, that it makes unnecessary and invidious distinctions. Why, sir, I ask, should we hold out inducements by our Constitution and our laws to the oppressed and down-trodden of other lands in Europe, Asia, and the whole wide world, to emigrate to this land, and propose to make them citizens of the United States by naturalization, and then attempt, in our legislation, to draw invidious distinctions between them and the native-born citizens of the country? And besides, sir, the amendment of the gentleman seeks to make a distinction not merely between native and naturalized citizens, but between the naturalized citizens themselves. He would confine the benefits of this bill to those alone who are now in the country. Sir, I cannot consent to such a proposition. If the position of the gentleman from Tennessee be good and tenable, if it be right to make a distinction between citizens naturalized five years hence and those already naturalized, then, to be consistent, the gentleman should say, that persons born in the country hereafter shall not have the benefits of this bill. I believe that when men come here from foreign lands, and are naturalized according to the laws of the country, there should be no distinction. I would regard one and all, native and naturalized, as American citizens, standing upon the same great platform of equality; nothing more and nothing less.

One word now as to the proposition which I have offered in lieu of that of the gentleman from Tennessee. I would extend the privileges of this bill to those emigrants who have come to our shores with the intention of becoming citizens, and have declared their intentions to that effect. And I think this is right; I can see no danger to arise from it. Surely their coming to this country, and swearing allegiance to our Government, taking the initiatory steps for becoming citizens, and settling down and making improvements upon the public domain, are sufficient guarantee that their intentions are good. And they get no title to the land under five years, and then they will be entitled fully to the rights of citizenship.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I believe the rules entitle me to five minutes in closing upon the amendment I offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inform the gentleman that he is not entitled to the floor upon his amendment, but he is entitled to the privilege of replying to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. The gentleman from Illinois speaks of "invidious distinctions" between our own citizens and foreigners. I would ask the gentleman if our naturalization laws do not create invidious distinctions? Why do we impose upon the foreigner five years' residence here before he is allowed the right of suffrage, and before he is entitled to the privileges of citizenship? Pass the bill with the amendment which I have proposed, and what will be the result? Emigration may still come from abroad upon the very same terms that it has come to this country for the last ten years. We welcome the foreigner here to our free institutions, our free religion, and our free country. We welcome him to a land where industry meets with its reward, where energy is appreciated, and where he finds a home, liberty, and freedom from oppression—all this he gets, and it is all our ancestors ever had. You nor I, Mr. Chairman, can get the benefit of this bill unless we expatriate ourselves, unless we leave the land of our residence or our nativity, and go abroad to seek it.

The bill gives land to no persons except those who settle upon the public domain. How can you get the benefits of its provisions unless you go to the Territories and States where these public lands lie? Our legislation frequently makes distinctions, which are often alleged to be invidious. The objection which I have to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. NORTON] is this: It is nothing more nor less than a bribe to Europe, Asia, and the rest of the world, to come here in pursuit of land, not freedom, only; for we know many of them are not prepared to appreciate or enjoy the blessings of civil liberty.

There are already many thousands of the disciples of Confucius in California. You must invite more of them to come here, and set up their religion in opposition to that of Christ. You must invite all the Latter Day Saints, now scattered throughout Europe, to congregate in the valley of the Salt Lake. Where will this thing stop? You have offered, I say again, a bribe to the lazzaroni of Europe, and the paupers of the whole world, to come here, mingle with us in a free Government, and partake of free institutions, which nothing but a long residence among us could enable them to appreciate and understand. The amendment I have offered proposes to give the benefits of this bill to native-born citizens, and to those who have already shown their devotion to the country by becoming naturalized, and to those who have shown their desire to do so by filing their declaration of intention to become citizens, in the mode and manner prescribed by law. To these, and their posterity, am I willing to extend this bounty; but to these only.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then put; and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ETHERIDGE:] and, having been taken, the amendment was disagreed to—ayes 32, noes not counted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I now move to amend in the twenty-first line of the pending section, by striking out the word "fourteen," and inserting the word "twenty-one," so that the clause would read:

And provided further, In case of the death of both father and mother, leaving an infant child or children under twenty-one years of age, the right and the fee shall inure to the benefit of said infant child or children.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, as it now stands, provides that if persons who settle upon the land shall die before the expiration of the five years, and leave children under fourteen years of age, the land shall be sold for their benefit. I propose to strike out the word "fourteen," and insert "twenty-one," so that if the settler upon the land shall die before his right to it shall become perfected, under the provisions of this bill, it shall inure to his minor children.

The question was put; and the amendment agreed to by the committee.

Mr. BOYCE. I move to amend, in the eighth line of the section pending, by adding after the following clause,

"And upon making the affidavit, as above required, and filing the affidavit with the register, he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the quantity of land already specified."

the words:

—"upon paying one dollar per acre for the same."

Mr. Chairman, I look upon our public domain as valuable, not merely on account of the money for which we may sell it, but upon an entirely different ground. It is really valuable to us because it is the safety-valve for the passions of the nation. Not that I mean to say that the Republic needs such a safety-valve at this moment, or that it will be needed to-morrow or the next day. But the time is coming when we will need this, and every other safety-valve.

Constituted as modern society now is, with its intense wants, its intelligence, and its desires, men who are in the humbler walks of life, upon whom fortune has frowned, but who have, nevertheless, a large share of intelligence, constitute a considerable portion of the social fabric, and they are not satisfied to remain in their humble condition. They will burst through the barriers of humble birth and poverty—those twin-jailors of the aspiring mind; and if they cannot have competency—if they cannot have comfort in the midst of society, they will have revolution. Why, look through the civilized world. What do we see in Europe? There is not a country there where peace can be preserved without standing armies. In France, where imagination most predominates, and where this feeling of a desire to rise is most vivid, they cannot preserve peace without having Algiers as a safety-valve upon which the warlike passion of the nation can expend itself. With us, in this country, our public domain, this vast wilderness of the West, is the safety-valve of the nation; and while I would not interpose any obstacles to that wilderness being settled up, I by no means sympathize with the policy that seeks to settle it up too quickly by inviting emigration. I look with no pleasure, I look with no hope, but rather flat despair, upon the day when that vast wilderness shall be settled up, when this teeming population, which some gentlemen speak of with so much delight, shall fill up all the gorges of the Rocky Mountains, and stretch a sympathetic chain from one ocean to the other; for, depend upon it, that with that day comes the end of the Republic, and anarchy and chaos.

While, therefore, I will not do anything to prevent the settlement of the western country, I cannot go for such a measure as this, which invites emigration from all quarters of the world to settle up this vast wilderness—too soon to bring upon us all the evils of a vast population.

Mr. GREY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, for this reason: I hold that the Government will be fully and valuably paid for the lands by having an occupant with his family on alternate sections of it for five years. Would any man from the old States go to these lands in the West, reside on, and cultivate them for five years without a title, and without the means of getting a title before the expiration of that time, unless he was unable to obtain a home and independent competency in the country where he was raised, and to which he was attached by the ties of kindred and earliest associations?

Now, sir, I, for one, am not afraid that this bill, giving the pitiful amount of one hundred and sixty acres of western lands upon such terms, will bring all Europe to this country. The sixth section of the bill has been overlooked, for it amply guards against all reason for such apprehensions. It provides that no man shall enjoy the benefits of this bill who is not now a resident in this country, and who shall not be a citizen of the United States when he applies for a patent. It may, and I hope will, induce many foreigners now resident, many of them paupers, in our crowded cities and commercial ports, to go West, build their cabins, clear up the forests, and cultivate those productive lands for five years, and, before the patent is issued, they will, from so long an agricultural life, have become thoroughly Americanized, and good citizens of the Republic—identified in interest with, and attached to, our Government and its institutions.

Why, sir, does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ETHERIDGE] wish to pass an alien law, and say that foreigners shall not come here, or does he wish to compel them, when here, to remain in the large cities as paupers and vagabonds, instead of letting them go to the West, there to unite with our hardy pioneers in settling up the wilderness, and thus become Americanized, by adding to the products, the exports and imports, and to the commerce, wealth, and power of the nation? I ask gentlemen from the old States who are opposed to this measure, what they want to do with the public lands? How do they wish to dispose of them? I ask my friend from Virginia in what manner or how they desire to dispose of those lands?

All admit that the public domain belongs equally and alike to every State in the Union, and that Congress has the power, under the Constitution, to dispose of them; but the new States claim that they shall be donated exclusively to them for railroad and other purposes. Sir, can such an unequal and unjust demand be agreed to by members in this House from the old States? Will you sell the lands and divide the proceeds equally among all the States? or will you divide the lands themselves equally between all? or will you give them for railroads or education equally to each State according to the ratio of Federal population? Oh, no; neither of these propositions will be agreed to. Sir, we cannot stand still and let them be sold and thus settled up; because the new States will, in a very few years, have the strength to pass through Congress a bill granting all Government lands to the States in which they lie, and in that way the old States will soon be robbed of all of their share.

It is difficult, yea, impossible, to shape any bill on this subject free from all objections. But, by the one now before us, an opportunity is afforded to citizens of the old States to obtain some small portion of those lands, to acquire which they have paid largely of their blood and treasure, and have, also, paid proportionately for surveying and bringing them into market. But, now, when it is proposed, that in consideration of those expenditures, any citizen of the old States shall, in like manner with citizens of the new States, have one hundred and sixty acres, if they will cultivate it for five years, it is objected to, unless they will pay one dollar per acre. Why, sir, the old States have already paid for them, and for their surveying, and never have shared in their distribution. Sir, with the fact staring us in the face that the new States will, in a very few years, vote through Congress a bill giving to them all these lands, shall we of the old States agree to stand still—to sit here, sir, and vote down every proposition which will tend to benefit our constituents, because those propositions are not perfect and free from all objections?

Sir, I regard this homestead bill as antagonistic to the claim from the new States that they ought to, and will have all the lands donated exclusively to them; and, for one, I will freely give the alternate quarter sections to build up independent freeholders in the shape of actual settlers upon, and cultivators of the soil, for the consideration of a five years' residence, greatly in preference to giving them, without price, to railroad companies, mammoth corporations, and monopolists in the new States, or to donating them without consideration to the new States to the exclusion of the old.

The amendment was again read.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HENN. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture to the following amendment, which I now present:

Strike from the following proviso the words "and have not alienated the same, or any part thereof;"

"Provided, however, That no certificate shall be given or patent issued therefor, until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry; and if, at the expiration of such time, the person making such entry, or, if he be dead, his widow, or, in case of her death, his heirs or devisee, or, in case of a widow making such entry, her heirs or devisee, in case of her death, shall prove by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land, and still reside upon the same, and have not alienated the same, or any part thereof, then, in such case, he, she, or they shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided for by law."

And in lieu thereof insert the following:

And shall make affidavit that he or she has not sold, or, in any manner, directly or indirectly, disposed of said land, or any interest he or she may or might have in the same.

Mr. HENN said: By the provisions of the bill it is made the duty of the applicant to prove by two disinterested witnesses that he has not alienated the land entered by him. The question whether he has alienated the same or not, is one which lies within his own bosom, and which he cannot prove. I am in favor of perfecting all the details necessary to bring him within the provisions of the bill. He cannot prove a negative. It is a matter, as I said before, which lies within his own bosom, and is left to his own affidavit. I trust that the amendment may be adopted.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. READY. I propose to amend that amendment. Insert in the seventeenth line, second section after the word "alienated," the words "contracted to alienate or mortgage," and insert in the seventeenth line, after the word "thereof," "and that the same was entered for his or her own settlement, occupancy and cultivation, and not for the use or benefit of any other person."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Tennessee that he had better withhold his amendment until the vote is taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, as the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee does not propose to be inserted in the same place in the bill.

Mr. READY. It is in the same line.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in the same line, but does not affect the same place in the bill. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. HENN.]

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. READY. I now renew my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. READY. The section, if amended as I propose, will read that he or she "has not alienated or contracted to alienate, or mortgage the same or any part thereof, and that he enters the same for his own use, occupation, and possession."

The object which I have in view in presenting that amendment, is to protect this bill against the dangers of speculation, as speculation will undoubtedly be attempted on a large scale if there are not sufficient guards thrown around the bill. Suppose this case—and it is certainly one which is very likely to occur, if it be not guarded against: The capitalist who is not entitled to enter lands, or who can only enter one hundred and sixty acres of land by occupying and settling on it, is desirous to secure a large amount of the public domain. All that he would have to do, as this section now stands, would be to procure fifty, or a hundred, or, if you choose, a thousand men, and say to them, "I will pay your expenses of transportation to the public domain. I will build a cabin for you, in which you can live for five years, all of which you will have free of charge, and I only ask of you to give me your obligation that, at the end of five years, when the ground is yours, you convey it to me."

Is there anything in this bill, as it now stands, which would prevent such a practice as that? If there is not, then the amendment I propose will remedy the difficulty; for the settler must swear, or prove that he has not alienated, or contracted to alienate or mortgage the land, and that he has entered for his own use, benefit, and occupation alone.

Now, sir, to illustrate this thing. I have been informed by gentlemen of intelligence and veracity, that under the preemption laws of this country, immense speculations have been practiced by this very system to which I have alluded. The capitalist procures a hundred men, without capital, to settle upon portions of the public domain. They take possession of it, and claim the benefits to which occupants are entitled in virtue of their possession, when they intended, at the very time of making the occupation, that the profits thereof should inure to the benefit of the capitalists who employed them to make such settlements. The same practice, it is apprehended, will obtain under this bill, unless the provision which I propose, or some similar one, is made. I think the amendment I have proposed will carry out the intention of the friends of the bill more effectually than any other which has been offered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not agree with my colleague in his reasoning upon this amendment. I think, sir, upon a little reflection, he will come to the conclusion that capital is too sagacious to take that means of investment. Why, the capitalist had better go and enter the land at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, than to attempt to hire settlers to go upon it and live, and cultivate it for five years, and then get the patent of the land transferred to him. He will find it to his advantage to do otherwise, and I think it will be found, in practice, that no capitalist will be so blind to his own interest as to adopt that policy.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and it was not agreed to.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles:

S. No. 185. An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Samuel Prioleau, deceased.

S. No. 199. An act to authorize a patent to be granted to Peter Poncin for certain lands therein described.

S. No. 234. An act for the relief of Conrad Wheat, junior, or his legal representatives.

S. No. 249. An act for the relief of Zadoc C. Ingraham.]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will follow up the general features of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ETHERIDGE,] because it manifestly is right. I propose to insert in the fifth line, after the word "family," the words "and with his or her family actually intends to occupy the same." So that it will read "that the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, upon application to the register of the land office, in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before said register, that he or she is the head of a family, and, with his or her family actually intends to occupy the same."

The committee will readily perceive that my purpose is to provide guards against the speculative features of this bill, as far as it is practicable to do so. I desire that the persons who avail themselves of its benefits shall do so with the bona fide intention of occupying the land they shall settle upon with their families. It certainly seems to me that such ought to be the policy of this committee, and also of the friends of the bill.

But it is manifest that the friends of this bill are determined, if possible, to prevent any amendments being made to it. I am more surprised at it because the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] who is distinguished as the Cerberus of the Treasury, fighting against every little claim that is presented to the consideration of Congress, is here going for this bill, and against all amendments; which bill involves an expenditure of millions of the public property.

The theory of the gentleman from Tennessee who last spoke [Mr. JONES] is without foundation. The idea entertained by that gentleman, that capitalists will not find any benefit accruing to them by getting poor men to go and settle upon these lands will be found to have no foundation.

I beg leave to call the attention of that gentleman to this matter, as I desire to ask him a question. Suppose a capitalist were to engage one hundred persons to go into the wilderness and get one hundred quarter sections under this Government? Why the very settlement itself would make a heavy and important increase in the value of that property. I am surprised that the gentleman from Tennessee, is now exerting all his active powers for the purpose of bestowing millions of the public property upon persons of whom he knows nothing. I have made these remarks with the hope that the amendment I have offered will be adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Virginia will look at the course I have pursued with regard to the smaller bills, he will find that I have not opposed a solitary one of them, unless I believed I had good and valid objections to its passage, and unless I thought that it conflicted with some principle which I could not violate in order to pass it. I disagree with the gentleman entirely about the value of the lands in a new country. That gentleman has lived where the lands have acquired a value from the settlement of the country.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to ask the gentleman a single question, and that is this: When amendments are offered which simply propose to guard against the speculative features of this bill, why is it that he opposes them?

Mr. JONES. I think that they will not have the effect of guarding against the speculator. I said a few moments ago, that the speculator who had capital would be blind to his own interests, in my opinion, who would undertake to hire settlers to go out and live upon the land for five years, when they might acquire the title for nothing, without paying $1 25 per acre. It would be better and far cheaper for him to pay $1 25 an acre, and get his title, than to hire settlers to go there—

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman does not reply directly to the question I asked. I ask him why it is that he opposes all amendments, in the shape of precautions, against the speculative features of this bill? It may be true that no speculator will undertake this thing, but why not guard against it?

Mr. JONES. I do not see the necessity for these amendments. The gentleman has avowed his opposition to the bill, and I do not wish to consume time in weighing and loading down the bill with amendments. I wish that the friends of the bill would not vote for the amendments, but pass the bill through the committee and get it immediately into the House.

Mr. HENN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee wish us to vote down all amendments?

Mr. JONES. I am willing to vote them all down.

Mr. BRIDGES. I propose the following amendment to the amendment:

That such application is made for his or her exclusive use and benefit, and those especially mentioned in this act; and not either directly or indirectly for the use and benefit of any other person or persons whomsoever.

I am a friend to this bill, and I intend to vote for it. But I wish to have such a bill passed as will carry out the intentions which this bill has in view. It is to encourage emigration to the West—the emigration of those persons who would become actual settlers there. Now, for one, I feel disposed to encourage the emigration of those persons who desire to become settlers upon and cultivators of the soil; to do so, and not to have the land exposed, to be taken up by capitalists who may send a hundred or a thousand persons into the West to take up the land, and then to become the beneficiaries of such settlements.

Sir, I am opposed to the capitalists of the country raking out of the sinks and purlieus of our cities the off-scouring of all creation, and sending them West to accomplish their own avaricious designs. I desire that a guard shall be placed against the prostitution of those lands for any such purposes. I want every person who goes there to avail himself of the benefits of this bill, to declare, under oath, what is his intention in going there; I want him to place it upon the records of the office that he goes there as an honest settler, and that he is not to be a tool in the hands of a millionaire, for the purpose of making him still richer.

Mr. Chairman, I do not see what possible objection the friends of the bill can have to the insertion therein of such a provision as I have offered. If it be the object of the bill and its friends to benefit the poor man, I ask that this body should make such provisions as will secure to him that benefit for his own enjoyment. Let the land be settled by him, and not by the capitalist—not by the millionaire. I ask that you should not encourage such persons as will never prove an honor or an ornament to society to emigrate to the West; but I ask that you encourage such persons as will feel an interest in the institutions of the country to which they go, and who will become, by moving there, good, useful, and valuable citizens.

That I understand to be the object of the bill, and if so there can be no reasonable objection by members of the House who are its friends to inserting a provision guarding these lands against the ultimate grasp of the millionaires of the country for their own uses and purposes. I repeat, that I believe that these are the objects of the bill; and if it be the object of the committee to carry them out in good faith, they will concur in this amendment, which makes it obligatory upon every person who emigrates to the West, for the purpose of availing himself of the benefits of this bill, to spread it upon the records, whenever he makes his application, that he enters the land for his own use, and for the benefit of his wife and children, who are intended to be provided for in the bill. Hoping that my amendment may be adopted, I will close my remarks.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that the amendment of my colleague ought to be adopted. I see no impropriety in requiring that any man who locates upon a quarter section of land should take an oath that it is for his own benefit.

Mr. HENDRICKS, (interrupting.) I rise to a question of order. I desire to know if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is speaking in opposition to the amendment? If he is not, I ask that the rule may be strictly enforced. One speech has already been made in favor of the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am certainly speaking in favor of the amendment. I have no desire to speak in opposition to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman is not in order, and cannot proceed with his remarks.

Mr. PRESTON. I believe the House is ready to vote upon this bill, and I therefore move that the committee rise, with a view of terminating the five minutes' debate, so as to have action on the bill and on the amendments which have been adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that that motion cannot be made in the House. You cannot move to suspend the rules to-day; and there is no rule authorizing you to terminate the five-minutes debate.

Mr. PRESTON. Does the gentleman mean to say that the House has no power to give an order to the committee?

Mr. JONES. No, sir, none; you could not get the motion before the House. It would not be in order.

Mr. PRESTON. I move, then, that the Committee rise, and report the bill and the amendments to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order, inasmuch as there are amendments pending which must be disposed of.

Mr. HENN. As the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRIDGES] is a very important one, I call for tellers upon it.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Is the amendment before the committee an amendment to an amendment, or a mere amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is an amendment to an amendment, and no further amendment is in order.

The question was then taken on Mr. BRIDGES's amendment to the amendment; and it was not adopted—ayes 58, noes not counted.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, as amended.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Is that open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to submit an amendment, but not to amend what the committee has inserted.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I offer the following amendment:

And all contracts and agreements entered into for the purpose of conveying the lands acquired under this bill prior to the issuance of the patents shall be wholly void.

It seems to me that that amendment accomplishes everything which can be accomplished by this committee. It merely proposes to make void all contracts or agreements made in reference to the conveyance of the land prior to the issuance of the patent, and conforms to our prior legislation and rights heretofore granted. Now you cannot prevent an individual, if he chooses to carry out an agreement, from doing it. If he chooses, under agreement, to go upon land and settle, and for a consideration to convey those lands afterwards to another, you cannot prevent him; and he can very well make his affidavit that he makes his settlement for himself, as required by the law, because he makes it for a consideration, which is equal to the land itself. You cannot prevent that. All this committee can do, it seems to me, is to adopt that amendment, which is in strict conformity to our past legislation on that subject, and which declares that the Government that has the title to the land, before it parts with it, shall prevent its beneficiary, so far as it can help, from transferring those lands; in other words, that the Government shall exert its whole power for his protection—that it shall declare that all contracts and agreements made for the conveyance of the land prior to the time when the Government parts with its full title shall be null and void; so that capitalists and speculators, if they enter into these agreements, shall have to enter into them wholly relying on the good faith of the party owning the land, at the same time that the law arms him with the means of defending himself, if he chooses to avail himself of it. It seems that that is the full extent to which this committee can go; and, in my opinion, that is an extent to which the friends of the bill ought to be willing to go.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I do not propose to occupy the time of the committee; but in answer to the gentleman from Alabama, I shall ask the Clerk to read the fifth section of the bill. It is a complete answer to the gentleman's argument.

The Clerk read the section, as follows:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if, at any time after filing the affidavit as required in the second section of this act, and before the expiration of the five years aforesaid, it shall be proven, after due notice to the settler, to the satisfaction of the register of the land office, that the person having filed such affidavit shall have actually changed his or her residence, or abandoned the said entry for more than six months at any one time, then, and in that event, the land so entered shall revert back to the Government, and be disposed of as other public lands are now by law, subject to an appeal to the General Land Office."

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment.

Mr. SMITH called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered and Messrs. HAVEN and LULLY were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 55.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is without a quorum.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum voting, the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DEAN. Let there be another count by tellers.

The Clerk then proceeded to call the roll, and, the same having been finished, the committee rose, and Mr. ORR taking the chair, as Speaker pro tempore, the Chairman of the committee [Mr. OLDS] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and, especially House bill No. 37; and having found itself without a quorum, had ordered the roll to be called, and directed him to report the facts to the House, with the names of the absentees; which were as follows:

Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Bell, Bliss, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bugg, Campbell, Caruthers, Chase, Christian, Churchwell, Culum, Curtis, Dent, Dunham, Eddy, Edgerton, Etheridge, Fenton, Flagler, Goode, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Hillyer, Houston, Howe, Daniel T. Jones, Kittredge, Latham, Leitcher, Lindsey, Lyon, McDougall, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Maurice, Maxwell, Meacham, Morgan, Murray, Packer, Parker, Peck, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Reese, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Scudder, Skelton, William R. Smith, Snodgrass, Alexander H. Stephens, Straub, Walbridge, Walker, Walley, Walsh, Warren, Wells, Witte, and Daniel B. Wright.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum now being present the Chairman will resume his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. I propose the following amendment to the amendment—

Mr. CLINGMAN. I rise to a question of order. When the committee found itself without a quorum they were dividing upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH.] I submit to the Chair, as a point of order, that when the committee is in the act of dividing no member has a right to stop the division and offer an amendment. He has no right to interrupt the vote at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, and holds that a vote without a quorum is no vote. The parliamentary practice has been such, that even upon a call of the yeas and nays, after one side only had voted, it is in order to interrupt the call and offer an amendment. After that the vote is taken over again.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That has not been the practice here.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the question stands as though no vote had been taken, and the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] is in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am a friend of this bill, and therefore desire to see it consistent with itself. The last amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been adopted, and I think very properly—

The CHAIRMAN, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman send up the amendment he proposes?

Mr. HENDRICKS. My amendment is to strike out the words "and with his or her family."

The CHAIRMAN. The words which the gentleman proposes to strike out have been adopted as an amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then my amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] and upon that the committee, upon voting, found itself without a quorum.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is to that amendment to which I offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose to strike out words from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, or out of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRIDGES?]

Mr. HENDRICKS. From the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is then in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRIDGES.] I think it was right. The committee have decided to extend the benefits of the provisions of this bill to two classes of persons. First, to those who are the heads of families; and second, to all persons over the age of twenty-one years. The first section of the bill was amended to that effect, and the second section was made to conform to it, so as to make a party swear either that he is the head of a family, or is over the age of twenty-one years.

Now the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia proposes that the party shall swear that he intends to reside upon the land, with his or her family. If that is so, sir, then persons who have no families, and yet are over twenty-one years of age, cannot have the benefits of this bill. The effect of the amendment, as I understand it, is, that the party shall make oath that he intends to reside upon the land with his or her family. Now a person over twenty-one years of age, and without a family—and such persons the amendments heretofore adopted propose to embrace—cannot avail themselves of the provisions of this bill if the gentleman's proposition be adopted. The effect of that amendment will be to restrict the application of the bill to persons who are heads of families. Now that is directly in opposition to the tenor and intent of the amendments already adopted. If I am mistaken as to the amendment, the gentleman from Virginia will correct me.

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman misapprehends my amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let it be read.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

"And with his or her family intends actually to occupy the same."

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman will perceive that my amendment has direct reference to the part of the section which precedes it, and with which it has immediate connection. If adopted, the section will read:

"That the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, upon application to the register of the land office in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the said register that he or she is the head of a family, and with his or her family intends actually to occupy the same."

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is what I object to. The gentleman overlooks the fact that the committee have already amended that part of the section, by inserting after the word "family" the words "or twenty-one years of age." The gentleman's amendment, if adopted, will come in after that, and create an inconsistency. I would have voted for his amendment before the committee made the amendment to extend the provisions to persons over twenty years of age. I did not support that amendment. But it has been adopted; and the gentleman's proposition now proposes to restrict the provisions of the bill, and make it, by inference, what it was before that amendment was adopted. That would create an inconsistency, and therefore I am opposed to it.

Mr. SMITH. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that this section reads as follows:

"That the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, upon application to the register of the land office in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the said register that he or she is the head of a family."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. On my motion this morning, that was amended by adding thereto the words "or twenty-one years of age."

Mr. SMITH. Then, if necessary, my amendment may be modified, so as to apply it only to those who are the heads of families; though I do not think it necessary to alter it, as evidently, from the context, it would only apply to that class of persons, to be benefited by the provisions of the bill, included in the words "head of a family."

The idea of my amendment is, that a person who is the head of a family, and intends to avail himself of the provisions of this bill, shall make an affidavit that he is such, and intends, with his or her family, actually to occupy the land which he shall locate under this bill. For I would not allow a man, who has a wife and children, to go and locate lands and leave them at home, to the destruction of all social relations and the domestic happiness of the parties—instances of which we have seen too often in relation to those who have gone to California.

My purpose is to carry out the provisions of this bill in good faith. I you want the western country settled by the operation of this bill, you will provide that the man who has a wife and family, and wishes to avail himself of the advantages of it, must take his wife and children with him. That is the object of my amendment, and the purpose I seek to secure. I think it ought to be secured. The amendment may require some modification, in consequence of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES;] but undoubtedly the principle of the amendment which I offer is sound and correct in itself. I cannot say, without examination, that it needs modification; but still it is a question of mere verbiage, and the modification can be made so as to make the matter all harmonious and proper.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. HENDRICKS to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] upon which tellers have been ordered.

Mr. DAWSON. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia will conflict with the amendment adopted in the first section of the bill, which extends its privileges to individuals over twenty-one years of age.

Mr. SMITH. It seems to me that it does not conflict with it in the slightest degree.

Mr. DAWSON. I think it does.

MESSRS. MATTESON and CHAMBERLAIN were appointed tellers.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 33, noes 65; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum has voted, and the roll will be called.

The roll was then called. The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. OLDS] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and especially House bill No. 37, and having found itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and had directed him to report the facts, with the names of the absentees, to the House. The absentees were as follows:

Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, James C. Allen, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Ball, Bell, Benson, Bliss, Boyce, Brooks, Carpenter, Chase, Churchwell, Crocker, Culum, Curtis, Dent, Disney, Durham, Eddy, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Etheridge, Fenton, Flagler, Franklin, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Hillyer, Houston, Howe, Hughes, Keitt, Kittredge, Latham, Leitcher, Lindsey, Lyon, McDougall, McMullin, McNair, Maurice, Meacham, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Packer, Parker, Peck, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Simmons, Skelton, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Straub, Andrew Stuart, Upham, Vail, Wade, Walker, Walley, Walsh, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, John Wentworth, Witte, and Zollcoffer.

A quorum having answered to their names, the committee again resumed its session.

Mr. GREENWOOD. My object in rising is to make an inquiry of the Chair. The committee having found itself without a quorum, the roll was called, and as soon as the Chairman of the committee had reported to the House, the committee again resumed its session. Now, I desire to know what steps are necessary in order to have the list of absentees called?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter entirely within the province of the House to determine. The committee having found itself without a quorum, the rules of the House required that the roll should be called. That was done, and a quorum having answered to their names, nothing further can be done in committee.

The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, upon which tellers have been ordered.

Mr. SAGE. Is it in order to move that the committee do now rise?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is in order.

Mr. SAGE. I submit it.

The question was put; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 32, noes 62; no quorum voting.

Mr. HENN. I demand tellers upon the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WESTBROOK and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 80.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question again recurred upon the adoption of Mr. SMITH's amendment, upon which tellers had been ordered.

Messrs. WESTBROOK and CAMPBELL were again appointed as tellers.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 68.

So the amendment, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. BRIDGES. I now offer my amendment as an independent proposition. It is as follows: after the word "family," in the fifth line, add:

And that such application is made for his or her exclusive use and benefit, and those specially mentioned in this act, and not either directly or indirectly for the use or benefit of any other person or persons whomsoever.

Mr. DAWSON. I have no objection to that.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. Is there any amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is not.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. DAWSON. It must be read through first.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not in order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suppose that it would be in order to move to strike out all the sections of the bill except the last.

Mr. DAWSON. That is not in order.

Mr. SMITH. Why not?

The CHAIRMAN. No section of the bill is now under consideration except the second section.

Mr. SMITH. Well, then I will submit an amendment. Would it be in order to discuss the constitutional question on a motion to strike out the second section?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that the gentleman would have a right to show reasons why the second section should be stricken out; and if there are constitutional objections to that section, he would have a right to urge them, but his remarks would have to be confined strictly to the provisions of that section.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. And it does not give any land.

Mr. SMITH. I move to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. HENN. Is that in order before the section has been perfected?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to perfect the section would take precedence of the motion to strike it out.

Mr. HENN. I have an amendment to offer with a view of perfecting the section.

Mr. SMITH. There was no amendment pending when I made my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the question is taken on the motion to strike out, it is in order to amend the section.

Mr. HENN. I renew the amendment, which I offered a short time since, to strike from the second section the words "and have not alienated the same, or any part thereof." I do not propose to insert anything in their stead.

I wish to state, that the bill, as it now stands, requires two witnesses to swear to the fact that the applicant has not alienated the land. In other words, it requires them to do what they cannot do—what no man in the world can do—to swear to a fact that they have no knowledge of in the world. I wish to do away with a legislative absurdity, if I may so call it.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to insert in the second section, after the word "witnesses," the following:

In the district court of the United States for the district in which such land shall be, upon ten days' notice to the United States district attorney, whose duty it shall be to attend and cross-examine said witnesses.

I shall be glad to obtain the attention of the committee on this subject for five minutes, at any rate. The proviso to the second section is as follows:

"Provided, however, That no certificate shall be given, or patent issued therefor, until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry; and if, at the expiration of such time, the person making such entry, or, if he be dead, his widow, or, in case of her death, his heirs or devisee, or, in case of a widow making such entry, her heirs or devisee, in case of her death, shall prove by two credible witnesses, that he, she, or they have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land, and still reside upon the same, and have not alienated the same, or any part thereof, then, in such case, he, she, or they shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided for by law."

The committee will observe that the purpose is to perfect the title on conditions here stated. The applicants are to prove, by two credible witnesses, the fact that they have come within the requirements of the bill. How are they to prove it? Why, sir, by introducing these witnesses before—whom? Into the land office before a person not accustomed to the solemn form of judicial proceeding. Now I propose to provide for this; and as the United States have a very great interest in the question, I propose that when the person comes to demand his patent it shall be on certificate of the court of record that the two witnesses, on notice to the district attorney, went into that court—the district court where the land is—and, on cross-examination, proved the possession of the property in accordance with the requirements of this bill. The question is, shall this precaution—I believe the only one introduced to protect this great measure—be introduced into this bill, and thus secure, under the supervision of the officer, with proper jurisdiction, the granting of the title? The certificate of the court would give all credit to such proof at the land office, and the officer there would be exempted from all trouble of examination. The patent is to issue, as a matter of course, upon the seal which shall be presented to him. I think the amendment ought to be adopted, and I trust that it will.

The question was taken, and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, if there be no other proposition to amend the second section, I propose to strike out that second section of the bill.

Mr. READY. I offer the following amendment. Add the following proviso to the second section:

And provided further, That in case of the death of the enterer before the completion of five years' continuous possession of his quarter section of land by him or her, and leaving no wife or husband, and no child or children, said land shall be subject to be disposed of by the Government of the United States as other public land.

Several MEMBERS. "Question!" "Question!"

Mr. READY. Mr. Chairman, as a friend of this bill, I desire that it be made as perfect as possible. I should not have troubled this committee with any amendment if I did not really believe it to be promotive of the objects which the friends of the measure have in view. Under the first provision of the second section, if the person, if he be a male, who enters this land die before five years have expired, leaving a widow the land goes to her. If she die then it goes to the children of the husband, if he shall have left children, and if he shall have left none, then it goes to the children of the widow, if she shall have left any. If, however, neither of them have left children then the benefit of the possession shall go to their heirs or devisees.

Now, under that provision it is obvious, that in case of the death of the husband and his wife without leaving children, then collateral relations come in. All these persons who stand in a degree near enough to be regarded as heirs will, under this law, be entitled to the benefit of the possession—nephews and nieces, for instance. Nor is it the intention, is it the desire, of this committee, to provide that the collateral relations of the enterer shall have the benefit of this law. It seems to me that that would be extending the provisions of the bill further than is proper. I think it would be carrying out the principles of this bill quite enough to secure the benefits of the bill to the enterer, or his widow, or, in case of the death of both of them, to their children. If they both die without children then those who have no claim upon them, except that they are related in the second or third degree to the enterer, should not come in and have the benefit of the land. In that case I think it right that the lands should revert to the Government or, in other words, that the Government should still continue to hold the title, from which it had never parted, and dispose of the land as of other public lands.

Several MEMBERS. "Question!" "Question!" The question was taken, and the amendment of Mr. READY was not agreed to.

Mr. SAGE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. After the word "law," in the nineteenth line, add,

And provided further, That at any time after the expiration of six months from the date of such entry, the person who would be entitled to a patent, if the said term of five years were then expired, may pay to the United States the sum of $1 25 per acre, and thereupon shall be entitled to a patent for said lands.

The spirit of this amendment is similar to that of one introduced this morning by the gentleman from Indiana. I deem it a very important amendment to this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The amendment is unnecessary. He can do it now under the general law. An individual now has the right to go and enter land and pay the money, and this bill does not prevent his doing it.

Mr. SAGE. If the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee is right, of course my amendment is unnecessary. The object I had in view was to protect families who might locate upon the public lands, under the provisions of this bill, and make improvements thereon; and when, from the death of the head of the family, or for some other cause, the family might desire to go back to their former home, I desired to make a provision whereby they might not lose, in such cases, the whole of their improvements. If the preemption law already covers this case, I cheerfully withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn.

The question now recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. MATTESON. I move to amend the second section by inserting after the word "have," in the sixteenth line, the words "or has;" and in the seventeenth line strike out the word "alienated," and insert in lieu thereof the words "contracted to sell or dispose of," so that the section shall read:

"Shall prove by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land, and still reside upon the same, and have or has not contracted to sell or dispose of the same, or any part thereof; then in such case he, she, or they shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided for by law."

The object of the amendment is to make the section more correct in phraseology. The words "or has" conforms the language to that which precedes it. The term "alienated" strictly applies only to cases where the individuals have the title. In these cases they have not, but are to have the title only upon certain specified conditions. There is no such thing as alienating land which one does not own.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. This whole bill, as I learned the other day, to my surprise, turns upon the construction to be given to a particular provision of the Constitution, to which I will call the attention of the honorable chairman of the committee who reported this bill, and the attention of this committee.

Mr. DAWSON. Does the gentleman submit an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment to strike out the second section is already pending.

Mr. SMITH. The clause of the Constitution to which I refer, is this:

"Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States."

The gentleman insists that, under the proper construction of the word "dispose," Congress has power to give. Well, sir, if this word has not already a constitutional construction, there might be something in the view which the gentleman has presented. But let me direct the attention of the committee to this subject. It is known to this House that the old Congress, under the Confederation, in 1780, asked that there should be a liberal cession of the public land, for various considerations set forth in its resolution. It is known that that cession was made but upon the express conditions which are to be found in the proceedings of that day, and to which I will call the attention of this committee.

Among other provisions stipulated by the Congress of 1783 was the following:

"That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, should be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United American States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and should be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."

The committee will observe, that the lands were to be disposed of; and how? They were to be considered as a common fund, for the benefit of all the members of the Confederation, Virginia included.

But let us go a little further, and look to the terms and conditions upon which Virginia made this cession. We find, in the compact which she signed, and which was accepted by Congress, the following provision:

"That all the lands within the Territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for or appropriated to any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United American States as have become or shall become members of the Confederation, or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever: Provided, That the trust hereby reposed in the delegates of this State shall not be executed unless three of them, at least, are present in Congress."

Again, in the celebrated ordinance which refers to this subject, I find the following:

"The Legislatures of those districts or new States shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers."

Here, then, I have given you the language used by Congress of that day. The words "to dispose of" are to be found in many of the important public papers of that day in reference made directly to this subject. How was the land to be disposed of? It was to be disposed of by sale, and the proceeds of the sale were to go into the Treasury, in order to be distributed for the common use and benefit of all the States. That language thus expounded is introduced into the Constitution. It is here written, that "Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

How is this property to be disposed of?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I am opposed to the amendment.

The question was then taken upon the amendment; and it was decided in the negative.

So the committee refused to strike out the second section.

The third section was then read:

"And be it further enacted, That all land acquired under the provisions of this act shall in no event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing the patent therefor."

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to strike out that section.

I differ with my friend from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] as I said this morning, in reference to the constitutional power of Congress over the public domain. The Constitution, in as full and comprehensive a term as can be found in the English language, invests the Government with the power to sell, donate, or convey away these lands. But, sir, when Congress has disposed of the public lands I want to know where the power is to be found in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to impose upon them any law or any conditions it may choose? When five years have elapsed the patent is issued, and Congress has parted with its title; it has fulfilled its power under the Constitution. It has disposed of the public lands. And by what right, I ask, by what authority, constitutional or otherwise, upon what principle of policy or expediency, can Congress be justified in fixing to these lands any conditions which may and will interfere with the rights and jurisdiction of the States over the land?

Why, sir, when we have parted with these lands we lose all authority over them. It is not like the power which Congress has to provide against the alienation of lands, the title of which the Government has not yet parted with. It is not like the proposition which I myself made this morning, the effect of which was that any condition or agreement on the part of the settler conveying away the land granted by this bill before the issuance of the patent, should be considered void. But when the patent, does issue, the Government ceases all rightful connection, under the Constitution, with these lands. And I say to the friends of this bill, that if they pass it with this section in it, without being authorized to say so, I shall be much mistaken in the legal knowledge possessed at the other end of the avenue, if this bill does not come back to the House vetoed. That officer will be derelict to his duty if he suffers a bill to pass which provides for the exercise of a power upon the part of Congress not warranted by the Constitution of the country, in direct violation of every principle which distinguishes the jurisdiction of the States from the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. Sir, when we part with these lands, they go to the citizens of some States, and are regulated by the laws of those States. When laws are made by those States respecting the lands within their jurisdiction, we have no right to ask that separate and distinct parcels of land shall be subject to separate and distinct laws. No, sir, they must all come under the laws and jurisdiction of the States in which they lie, and the effect of those laws cannot in any degree be influenced by any tenure the Federal Government may have to lands, the title to which it has parted with. The Federal Government has no right to hold the lands by one tenure and the State government by another. They must all come within the jurisdiction of the State; and it would be in violation of every principle of policy and expediency to maintain these different tenures, even if we had the right. It would be in violation of every principle of policy for the Government to fix upon lands we have parted with, any condition which was not fixed by the laws of the State, if we had the power to do it.

Mr. DAWSON. I must confess a little surprise at the manner in which the gentleman from Alabama has discussed this question. He commences his argument by holding up the presidential veto in advance. I desire to ask him by what authority he announces to this committee in advance that the President will veto this bill?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I said that I had no authority for making such an announcement, and the gentleman's question is therefore uncalled for.

Mr. DAWSON. Then what am I understand by the gentleman's remark?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I said expressly that I had no authority for making the assertion, but that if I was not mistaken in the legal knowledge there is at the other end of the avenue, this bill would come back to this House with a veto upon it. The gentleman's question is, therefore, entirely uncalled for.

Mr. DAWSON. Then the reference to even an anticipated veto was useless and unnecessary. I fear no such Executive interposition. The President is the friend of the pioneer, and in his message he shadows forth a lively interest in behalf of the actual settler. The question which arises here is simply this, whether Congress can make a conditional fee. For my part, I can see no difficulty in the matter. The right to annex conditions to absolute grants has been claimed and exercised by the States, as well as by the General Government. The deeds of cession contained conditions, and yet they conveyed the fee. I refer the gentleman to the eighth section of the treaty of 1817, by which a large tract of country in his own State was purchased from the Cherokee Indians. In that section a provision is made securing a lifetime estate to those settling upon the lands, with a reservation in fee-simple to the children, reserving to the widow her dower. That is still the law of the land, and I want to know whether the sovereign power of Alabama contested the legality of these conditions, or claimed the right to annul them? There has been no clash, then, between the relative rights, or jurisdiction of the General Government and that of the State government. The condition seems to have been acquiesced in by the gentleman's own State as legal and proper. I will read the section:

"And to each and every head of any Indian family residing on the east side of the Mississippi river, on the lands that are now, or may hereafter be, surrendered to the United States, who may wish to become citizens of the United States, the United States do agree to give a reservation of six hundred and forty acres of land, in a square, to include their improvements, which are to be as near the center thereof as may be practicable, in which they will have a life estate, with a reversion, in fee simple, to their children, reserving to the widow her dower, the register of whose names is to be filed in the office of the Cherokee agent; which shall be kept open until the census is taken, as stipulated in the third article of this treaty."—Art. 8, Treaty between Cherokee Indians and General Jackson Statutes at Large, vol. 7, page 159.

I will also refer the gentleman to the act of April 19th, 1816, which is styled "An act to enable the people of Indiana Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States." It will appear, by reference to the sixth section of that act, that Congress made a direct reservation of the salt springs lying within that Territory. Whilst they conveyed to the State the absolute fee of the lands, they explicitly declared that there should be no lease of them for a longer period at any one time than ten years. A provision of similar import was made in the fifth section of the act admitting Missouri into the Union. I will read the sections referred to:

"That all salt springs within the said Territory, and the land reserved for the use of the same, together with such other lands as may, by the President of the United States, be deemed necessary and proper for working the said salt springs, not exceeding, in the whole, the quantity contained in thirty-six quarter sections, shall be granted to the said State for the use of the people of the said State, the same to be used under such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Legislature of the said State shall direct: Provided, That the said Legislature shall never sell nor lease the same for a longer period than ten years at any one time."—Sec. 6, art. 2d. vol. 3, Statutes at Large, page 290.

Sec. 2. That all salt springs, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining to each, shall be granted to the said State for the use of said State, the same to be selected by the Legislature of the said State, on or before the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five; and the same, when so selected, to be used under such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Legislature of said State shall direct: Provided, That no salt spring, the right whereof now is, or hereafter shall be, confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall by this section be granted to the said State: And provided, also, That the Legislature shall never sell or lease the same, at any one time, for a longer period than ten years, without the consent of Congress.—Statutes at Large, vol. 3, page 347.

I might also refer the gentleman to the act of the 4th of June, 1832, granting pensions to the soldiers who served in the war of 1812, (United States Statutes at Large, vol. 4, page 530,) in which Congress, after granting the pensions, protects them against any liability to attachment, levy, or seizure by any legal process whatever, by State and national authority. Here is the provision of the act referred to:

"That the pay allowed by this act shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be paid to the officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private entitled thereto, or his or their authorized attorney, at such places and times as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct; and that no foreign officer shall be entitled to said pay, nor shall any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private receive the same until he be furnished the said Secretary satisfactory evidence that he is entitled to the same, in conformity to the provisions of this act; and the pay hereby allowed shall not be in any way transferable or liable to attachment, levy, or seizure by any legal process whatever; but shall remain wholly to the personal benefit of the officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or soldier entitled to the same."

The power has been exercised, not only as to chattels, but as to real estate. I think, therefore, there can be no difficulty as to the constitutionality of this provision. It is, next to the grant, the most important provision in the bill. Strike it out, and it ceases to be a bill to secure a homestead, and becomes a measure for the benefit of creditors.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the section proposed to be stricken out, by striking out the words "the issuing of the patent," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "entry and settlement."

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt myself but that the United States may part with its title to the land, as contemplated in this bill, and make a condition that it shall not be sold for debts previously contracted. I think there is no doubt with regard to that position; but, while I am willing to concede this, I doubt very much the policy of permitting a settler to enter upon land, and thereby acquire a credit in the community in which he lives, and preventing whatever interest he may have in the land from being taken under execution and sold for the payment of his debts.

Mr. LILLY. Is there is not a law in the gentleman's own State exempting land to a certain amount from debt?

Mr. WRIGHT. In answer to my friend from New Jersey, I will state that there is such a law on the statute-book of Pennsylvania; but that does not conflict with the position I hold here. That is an exemption law; and it does not apply to debts previously contracted. The mischief of this bill, as it now stands, consists in this: You send a man there to make a settlement, and the fact of sending him, and his making improvements there, gives him a credit in the community in which he lives. Well, are the different individuals who give him credit, from the fact of his being a settler on the land, to be defrauded from the collection of their debts? That is the position. If the bill passes in the shape in which it has been reported by the Committee on Agriculture, you will permit the individual to make his entry, and remain there for a period of five years, to contract debts from all persons who are willing to trust him for any amount; and then you prevent the collection of those debts by those who have given the credit.

Now, sir, that is a wrong principle of legislation. I am perfectly willing that the man who makes his entry and settlement upon the land should begin the world anew; that, at the time he shall enter upon it he shall go, to all intents and purposes, untrammelled from the debts previously contracted; but you extend to him a greater privilege, for you say that for the five years he is living upon the land none of his improvements, nor the land itself, shall be subject to sale for the payment of debts that he shall contract during that period. There is no charity in carrying out that principle; but it is one which conflicts with and impairs contracts—no contracts at the inception, but those he has been enabled to make while in possession of the land with persons who were willing to trust him.

Now suppose a settler enters upon the land and remains there for a period of four years; that land may have increased in value from $1 25 per acre to perhaps $20 or $25 per acre. The individual, after he has made the improvements, and the value of the land has increased, may have contracted debts to a large amount, and very properly, but yet you put it into his power to defraud every man who shall have trusted him. Now, sir, I cannot agree to the carrying out of any such principle as that. Let him go there, as I say, untrammelled. Let no debts follow him up to the time he makes his entry; but do not protect him in the enjoyment of his property and the bounty of the Government for five years, so that he shall have the power to commit great frauds on the community in which he lives.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I propose to amend that section by adding thereto, "unless the Legislature of the States in which such lands lie shall otherwise direct."

Several MEMBERS. "Question!" "Question!" Mr. DISNEY. Or unless the law of the State in which the lands lie shall otherwise direct.

Mr. LETCHER. Yes; unless the law of the State in which such lands lie shall otherwise direct.

It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, as a very extraordinary provision in this bill any way. If a man has $200, and goes to the State of Illinois and lays out his money in the purchase of a hundred and sixty acres of land, that land is to be made subject to all sorts of debts that can be mustered up against an individual. But if you get a man to go to the State of Illinois and to take land without paying anything for it to the Government, in that case, by way of inducing him to go, you propose to exempt him from all debts which he may have contracted prior to the time at which he is entitled to his patent.

It may so happen, Mr. Chairman, that in putting up the necessary buildings to shelter his family, and to protect them from the storm, he may have contracted debts in procuring means to do so. These debts, so contracted, may probably have given to this land double the value that it had at the time he took possession of it as Government land; and although it has been thus enhanced in value from the labor of other persons, yet you provide in this act that it shall not be responsible for any debts which may have been contracted in giving to it this enhanced value.

Now, sir, I propose to add to this amendment, that that shall be the law unless the Legislatures of the States or of the Territories in which these lands may lie shall otherwise direct. And I do it for this reason as was remarked by the gentleman from Alabama: if you permit this provision to be carried out you sanction the doctrine here that the Congress of the United States can go into the States and undertake to regulate the laws of debtor and creditor in defiance of all laws that the States themselves may have enacted on this subject. You have there, under this provision, made the beneficence of the Government extend to the exemption of these public land from all liabilities for debt, while the hard-working man who has purchased his land, who has paid for the permission to take possession of it, who pays the debts that he has contracted for the improvement of it, when he, I say, is afterwards overtaken by misfortune, he is made to pay every debt he owes; and his family is turned out of house and home to accomplish this purpose under the State law.

It seems to me that if gentlemen swallow this, there is no aggression on the rights of the States which may not be perpetrated by Congress. If they can go to that extent they can also regulate the laws in reference to the manner in which property can descend. They can regulate the laws in regard to marriage; they can regulate the laws in regard to any particular local relations, or any particular local law which may exist in these States. Would it not be a monstrous power to assert on the part of Congress? and would it not be such a power as, if sanctioned, would necessarily lead to the most serious abuses?

Mr. DEAN. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman, because I suppose it to be unnecessary. That will be the law without it.

The question recurring upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER]—

Mr. LETCHER called for tellers; which were ordered.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I think there is not a quorum present, and therefore I move that the committee do now rise.

[Cries of "Oh, no!" "No!"]

The question was put; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 46, noes 35.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Can the committee rise without a quorum?

The CHAIRMAN. It can.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and, by special order, House bill No. 37, commonly known as the homestead bill, but had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. LILLY. I move that when the House adjourn it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Thomas H. Bayly, Barry, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Benton, Bissell, Boyce, Bridges, Chastain, Cook, Corwin, Craig, Cumming, Cutting, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Disney, Dowdell, Drum, Dunbar, Edgerton, Edmunds, Edmundson, Everhart, Farley, Florence, Franklin, Gamble, Giddings, Green, Greenwood, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hill, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, Keitt, Kerr, Kittredge, Knox, Lamb, Letcher, Lilly, Lindley, McCulloch, McQueen, Matteson, John G. Miller, Morgan, Morrison, Noble, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phillips, Pratt, Preston, Pringle, Ready, David Ritchie, Rogers, Sage, Shannon, Shaw, Simmons, Singleton, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tweed, Upham, Walbridge, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Daniel B. Wright, Yates, and Zollicoffer—90.

NAYS—Messrs. Appleton, Breckinridge, Campbell, Carpenter, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Cox, Dawson, Dean, Estman, Ellison, English, Ewing, Faulkner, Fuller, Grow, Hamilton, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Lane, Lindsley, McNair, Macy, Maxwell, May, Middlewarth, Millson, Nichols, Olds, Orr, Phelps, Powell, Puryear, Robbins, Rowe, Russell, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Seward, Shower, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Solters, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Elihu B. Washburne, Wheeler, and Hendrick B. Wright—65.

So the motion was agreed to.

COMMUNICATIONS FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House communications from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War, inclosing a report from the Colonel of Topographical Engineers, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 23d of January last, showing all contracts made by, and correspondence subsequently, with the Chief of the Bureau of Topographical Engineers, for furnishing materials of wood and stone for improving the harbors and rivers on Lake Michigan, under the act "making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers," approved August 13, 1852.

On motion by Mr. FULLER, it was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, accompanied by the annual report of the Board of Inspectors of the Penitentiary of the United States for the District of Columbia, for the year ending the 31st of December, 1853.

On motion by Mr. JONES, it was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. WALBRIDGE, the House, then, at fifty minutes past three o'clock, adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 6, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to offer a joint resolution for settling the accounts of A. Boyd Hamilton, and I ask that it be put upon its passage.

The resolution was then read through by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon ordering the resolution to be engrossed and read the third time.

* Mr. HAMILTON. Is there an appropriation in the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that there is an appropriation provided for in the resolution, and it must therefore go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RUSSELL. The appropriation for settling the accounts of Mr. Hamilton is provided for in the act of 1852.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the gentleman that there is a fund already set apart for the payment of A. Boyd Hamilton, and the resolution now offered only directs the mode by which his accounts shall be ascertained and settled, and it need not therefore go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The resolution was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. APPLETON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce joint resolutions from the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts in relation to cheap ocean postage.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Let the resolutions be read for information.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The usual course is to lay these resolutions upon the table, and order them to be printed. I hope there will be no objection to this course at present.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts sending up his resolutions to the Clerk's desk.

The resolutions were then received, read by the Clerk, and ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. FULLER. I beg leave of the House to introduce resolutions from the State of Maine.

Mr. CLINGMAN. What disposition does the gentleman wish to make of them?

Mr. FULLER. That they lie upon the table, and be printed. I hope that they will be read.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to reading any more of these papers. I do not know what these resolutions are. I am willing that the usual course be taken with them, that they lie upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. FULLER. They are very short, and I hope that the House will consent to hear them.

The resolutions were then read. They protest against the passage of any bill for the organization of the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas which shall contain any provision repealing the act of 1820, known as the Missouri compromise.

The resolutions were then ordered to lie on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The question then recurred upon the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, having been put, was carried in the affirmative.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ORIN in the chair.)

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, they had under consideration special order of the House, being House bill (No 37) "to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified."

The fourth section being under consideration, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PHILLIPS] moved to strike out the section. The gentleman from Virginia moved to amend by adding at the end of the section, for the purpose of perfecting it, the following words: "Unless the legislative authority of the State or Territory in which such lands lie shall otherwise direct." The question pending is, therefore, upon the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, upon which tellers have been ordered.

Mr. LETCHER. If it will meet with the approbation of the committee, I will withdraw the amendment which I offered, and allow the question to be taken unembarrassed upon the motion to strike out the entire section.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

The question then recurred upon the motion of Mr. PHILLIPS to strike out the fourth section.

Mr. DISNEY. I renew the amendment withdrawn by the gentleman from Virginia to add at the end of the section the following words: "Unless the legislative authority of the State or Territory in which such lands lie shall otherwise direct."

I propose this amendment because it changes the entire character of the provisions of the section which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PHILLIPS] proposes to strike out. That section, in my opinion, contains the humbug of the bill. So great is its absurdity, that to pass a bill containing such a section would be an imputation upon the intelligence of the House. It attempts an exercise of power which it is not in the competency of Congress to exercise.

Sir, I desire to say a word or two in reference to the character of this section; and I am sure a word or two is all that will be necessary to convince the House of its absurdity. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAWSON] talks about its being a conditional grant. Well, sir, if it is a conditional grant, and the conditions are in default, there is a reversionary interest, and the title of the land will revert back to the United States; and in that event the settler loses his homestead. But if it be a perfect and unlimited grant it must be subject to the authority of the State in which the land lies, and in that event the General Government could have no power over the subject. So that, construe the section as you will, it is null and void. If it is to have any effect at all it will be to delude the settler himself. It will lead him to believe that his land will not be liable to be taken for debt. Sir, every lawyer in the House knows that Congress has no power to make such a limitation upon the land, after the title has gone out of the possession of the Government. It is simply delusive to the honest settler himself.

But, I repeat, without going into any extended argument in relation to this matter, that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAWSON] intends a conditional grant, then if the condition be in default, the title reverts to the United States, and the settler loses his homestead. If it be not a conditional grant, but an absolute one, why then, the title being in the parties, the land must be subject to the laws of the States. And yet, with a full knowledge of a fact of this sort, can it be that an intelligent body like this Congress will pass an act which every lawyer in it knows well would be inoperative? That is all I desire to say.

Mr. DAWSON. The honorable gentleman from Ohio argues against this provision as if it was not only in violation of the principles of law, but as if it was a new question, presented for the consideration of this body. Now, I will merely refer the honorable gentleman to the fourth section of "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved September 28, 1850, which contains the very principle involved in the fourth section of this bill.

Mr. DISNEY. Read it.

Mr. DAWSON. It is as follows:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all sales, mortgages, letters of attorney, or other instruments of writing, going to affect the title or claim to any warrant or certificate issued, or to be issued, or any land granted, or to be granted, under the provisions of this act, made or executed prior to the issue, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever; nor shall such certificate or warrant, or the land obtained thereby, be in anywise affected by, or charged with, or subject to, the payment of any debt or claim incurred by such officer or soldier prior to the issuing of the patent."

The honorable gentleman from Ohio was a member of this House at the time that law was passed. Where then was his vigilance? Where were then his constitutional objections to the principle which it is now proposed to make applicable to the laboring classes?

Mr. DISNEY. Will the gentleman yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. DAWSON. No, sir; I do not yield. It seems to me that the discovery comes rather late. It comes at a time when it is proposed to extend the benefits of the principle to a large class of the laborers of this country. The distinguished gentleman sat still in his seat and permitted that law to pass without uttering one word of complaint, yea, he even voted for it, and yet now a new light dawns upon him.

The question was then taken on Mr. DISNEY's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. EASTMAN. I offer the following amendment:

But the said land shall be subject to taxation the same as other land sold by the United States, from the date of the entry thereof, as specified in the first clause of the second section of this act; and if the person who enters the same shall neglect or refuse to pay all legal taxes thereon within — days after they shall be demanded he shall forfeit all his rights under this act.

I am not certain that the amendment which I have offered will effect the object which I desire, but I have offered it for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee, and of the friends of the bill, to the particular point to which it alludes.

It seems to me, if it be good policy on the part of this Government to give lands to actual settlers, that, at the same time, it should compel those settlers to pay the same amount of taxes, according to the value of the land that other people pay who paid for their land at the time they acquired possession of it. But there is no provision in this bill to compel the recipients of this land to pay tax upon it at all. They come into the possession of it; they have the benefit of the laws; they have the protection of the courts, and everything of that sort, and yet they do not contribute one single cent toward the support of the Government affording them all these advantages. Now, it seems to me that the effect will be, if some provision of the kind I have suggested is not enacted in this bill, that you will compel the person who pays for his land to support those persons who occupy this land without any pay, which should not be countenanced by this committee.

Just look at this matter. Here is a farmer with a farm of three or four hundred acres, and wild land all around him. A, B, and C come under the provisions of this bill, and acquire their land. They are voters, and have it within their power to compel the man who has paid for his land to build all the school-houses, all the bridges, make all the roads, and, in short, pay for the entire government of the whole town, and yet not pay one single dollar themselves. I think that the system is wrong; and if my means of getting at the remedy are not the proper ones, I would suggest to the friends of the measure to propose the proper ones to avoid the difficulty at which I have aimed. There may be some fault in the amendment which I have proposed. If any gentleman sees any better remedy I am willing to submit to it. I am tenacious of this point; but I suggest to the friends of the bill to let something of the kind be engrafted upon it.

I know it will be contended by the gentlemen upon the other side that you cannot tax Government land. If you cannot tax Government land you ought to adopt some measure by which you shall compel the persons who occupy this land to pay for the support of the Government of which they have the benefit, and by which you shall not force the person who has paid for his land to pay all the taxes.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That is an extraordinary amendment. The principle involved is not incorporated in any tax law of which I have any knowledge. You propose to levy a tax upon the Government land because we pass a law that individuals may locate upon it. These individuals may not perfect their right to a patent under this law. The gentleman knows that we cannot now tax the land of the Government. If these people do not settle upon that land under this law you cannot get any tax. Consequently, I cannot see any great hardship in permitting this land to remain free of taxation until the settler shall have acquired a full title. We cannot provide for the selling of this land for taxes. Nobody will ask that; but, sir, because the man shall not pay the taxes which the State levies the gentleman proposes that his right to the land shall be forfeited. Why, sir, it is but a short time—only five years—that these lands are proposed to be excepted from taxation; and it has only been two, three, or four years, I believe, since a law excepting all the Government lands from taxation for five years after they were sold was repealed. And the gentleman himself, [Mr. EASTMAN,] I think, must see that it is no very great hardship to the State in which the lands are situated for them to refrain from taxing such lands until after the term limited by the Government.

Mr. EASTMAN. I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin proposes, with the unanimous consent of the House, to withdraw his amendment. Is there any objection to his doing so?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Yes, sir, I object. Let us vote down all these amendments.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask to present the following proviso, to be added at the end of the fourth section to the bill.

The Clerk read the proviso, as follows:

Provided however, That no entry, authorized by virtue of this act, shall be construed to extend to the lands ceded to the United States by Virginia, and other States, prior to the adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. Chairman, if the gratuity intended by this bill was restricted to those lands which have been acquired by purchase under the present Government it would remove one difficulty which I have in yielding it my support. But, surrendering as it does for gratuitous settlement the lands which were acquired by cession from Virginia and other States, prior to the adoption of the Constitution, I do not see how we can dispose of them in the manner here contemplated without a palpable violation of the trust upon which those cessions were made and accepted. We have been told, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DAWSON,] that the Constitution in giving to Congress the power to dispose of the territory belonging to the United States has invested it with a plenary and unlimited discretion in the disposition of the public lands. This might be so if the Confederation had not accepted the cession from Virginia, subject to certain conditions annexed to the grant. Is there anything in the Constitution which abrogates these conditions?

General Jackson, in his message in 1833, communicating to Congress the reasons of his veto of Mr. Clay's land bill, with great truth, says:

"The Constitution of the United States did not delegate to Congress the power to abrogate these compacts. On the contrary, by declaring that nothing in it 'shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State,' it virtually provides that these compacts, and the rights they secure, shall remain untouched by the legislative power, which shall only make all 'needful rules and regulations' for carrying them into effect." All beyond this would seem to be an assumption of delegated power."

Now, sir, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who reported this bill, and who so warmly advocates it, to examine the condition which Virginia has annexed to her cession of that immense northwestern territory, and then let him vindicate, if he can, his bill from the charge which I now make against it, of a palpable violation of the trust created by that grant. This cession was not made to the United States as a nation; it was made before the present Constitution was adopted or even thought of. It was made to the States, as States, in their State capacity, Virginia inclusive. Here is the condition:

"That all the lands within the Territory so ceded, &c., shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation, or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."

It is scarcely necessary to say, that under the terms of this cession a great public and national trust was created and assumed by this Government. Such has been the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Jackson vs. Clark, (1 Peters, 635.)

Mr. Clay's celebrated land bill, which proposed a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands amongst the States according to their Federal representation, was vetoed by General Jackson, and denounced by the whole Democratic party, because, as it was said, regardless of this binding compact, it assumed that the United States was the unconditional owner of these lands. If this was a correct position as to Mr. Clay's bill, with how much greater force does it apply to a bill that is confessedly and avowedly based upon that assumption, and which makes a sweeping and absolute gift of the public domain without the slightest regard to the rights so jealously guarded in the deed of cession? We heard something the other day about an Executive veto. I know nothing of the views of the President in regard to this bill. But it would seem to me—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. I think we had better get along with this bill in its present shape, and I hope no amendment will be adopted. Therefore I am opposed to it.

The question was taken upon Mr. FAULKNER's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the motion to strike out the fourth section, it was put, and decided in the negative.

Mr. ELLISON. I propose to amend the fourth section of the bill by striking out, after the word "the," in the fourth line, the words "issuing the patent," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "time at which a patent may issue," so that the section will read:

"That all land acquired under the provisions of this act shall in no event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt, or debts, contracted prior to the time at which a patent may issue therefor."

The object of my amendment is to make this section harmonious with the second section. It is provided in the second section, that at the end of five years, upon proof of residence and cultivation, that a patent may issue for the one hundred and sixty acres of land. Now, if a person shall go and reside upon these lands, and cultivate them, and yet chooses not to take out a patent therefor for ten or fifteen years, that land will, during all that period, not be liable for any debts contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor. As I said before, my object is to make the land liable at the end of five years—the time at which a patent may issue therefor—for all debts contracted subsequent thereto. That amendment will make the section harmonious with the second section, and make the land subject to subsequent debts.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I think the amendment unnecessary, and therefore I oppose it.

The question was then taken upon the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

No further amendment being offered to the fourth section, the Clerk read the fifth section, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That if any individual now a resident of any one of the States or Territories, and not a citizen of the United States, but, at the time of making such application for the benefit of this act, shall have filed a declaration of intention, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, and shall become a citizen of the same before the issuance of the patent, as made and provided for in this act, he shall be placed upon an equal footing with the native-born citizen of the United States.

Mr. DEAN. I move to strike out the word "now" in the second line.

I do not propose to debate this matter, but I think we are making an unnecessary discrimination here.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman from New York state the effect of his amendment?

Mr. DEAN. The effect of this amendment will be to allow persons who emigrate and declare their intentions after the passage of this act to receive the benefits of this bill the same as if they had declared their intentions before the passage of the act. I am not in favor of the restriction contained in this section. I think that a man who declares his intention to become a citizen the next week or the next year after it is passed ought to receive the benefits of this bill upon every principle of justice, as the man who has declared his intentions before the act goes into effect. I am utterly opposed to making a discrimination between any class of persons, no matter where they were born, or from what country they emigrated.

The principle upon which the bill is founded, and on which only it can be defended, is occupancy and settlement; and I see no reason for making the time when a declaration of intention to become a citizen is filed a ground for discrimination.

Mr. DAWSON. I insist that the provisions of the bill shall be confined to those persons who are now residents and citizens of the United States. I therefore object to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN.]

Mr. WADE. I propose to amend the section in line two, by striking out the words "individual now" and to insert in the third line the word "who" between the words "but" and "at."

The CHAIRMAN. The question must be first taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN.] That will not preclude the gentleman from Ohio from offering his amendment afterwards.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DEAN's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I now offer the amendment already sent to the Clerk's table.

I do not wish to trouble the committee with remarks upon this matter, but it does seem to me that it is perfectly idle for us to make any prohibition here with regard to foreigners, for it will not be three years before this whole subject will again be revived for the benefit of those who hereafter arrive in the country and apply for citizenship; and who will become, upon the principle of citizenship, entitled to receive the same benefits from the Government that those who are now residents are entitled to.

The evil of the legislation now asked for is that in a few years the same thing will be repeated over and over again. There is no use in talking about confining it to the present time. These foreigners, if they are to be encouraged at all, should be encouraged not to stop in the purlieus of the cities, where they will drag out a miserable existence in vice and intemperance, in every conceivable form, but they should be encouraged to emigrate into the country, where they can enjoy pure and fresh air, and where they can become agricultural laborers, rejoicing in an increased health of body, mind, and morals.

My favor for this amendment is predicated upon the fact that we shall have to do the same thing for many years, if we refuse it now, and thus time and money will be wasted. We shall certainly have to do it in less than two years, and we might just as well do it now and save time by it.

Mr. DAWSON. In reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, I will merely say, that it is not the province nor duty of this Congress to legislate for all the nations of the world and the rest of mankind. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. I desire to offer an amendment to the sixth section, which I will read presently; but before doing so, I desire to say that I am as good a friend of the homestead bill as there is in this House. The sixth section of the bill makes provision for a class of persons who may be now in the United States, who have not filed their declaration to become American citizens, but who may hereafter file such a declaration at any future time to obtain the benefit of the bill:

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a question of order. I want to know what is the question before the committee?

Mr. COBB. I will read my amendment presently.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to the gentleman's going on with his remarks, unless his amendment is first presented to the committee; and I insist that the time he has already occupied shall come out of the five minutes to which he may be entitled upon his amendment.

Mr. COBB. I move to strike out of the sixth section the following clause:

—"at the time of making such application for the benefit of this act, shall have filed a declaration of intention, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, and shall become a citizen of the same before the issuance of the patent, as made and provided for in this act," and to insert the following:

—who may have filed his or her declaration to become such prior to the passage of this act.

So that the section will then read:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any individual, now a resident of any one of the States or Territories, and not a citizen of the United States, but who may have filed his or her declaration to become such prior to the passage of this act, shall be placed upon an equal footing with the native born citizen of the United States."

I suppose I have a minute or two of my time still left. I desire to say that my object in offering this amendment is to confine the provisions of this bill to such persons as have filed their declarations to become citizens of the United States, or who may do so previous to the passage of this act. That provision will shut out from the benefits of the bill such foreigners as are now in the country, and who have not filed their declaration to become citizens of the United States before the passage of this act. If the foreigners who are now in the country have not the intelligence to know upon what their chances under this bill are to depend, should this provision be adopted, their friends will certainly tell them, and they will have time to file their intention to become citizens before the passage of this act. If they do not, I desire that they shall not become entitled to the benefits for which this bill provides.

I do not want the provisions of this bill to be extended to that floating foreign population who would never become citizens of the United States at all, unless you induce them to become such by the passage of this act. They may be induced to file their declaration, and live upon the land for five years, if you will give them the land then for their trouble; but they would never have done so if you had not held out the bid to them for that purpose. If any person will file his or her declaration prior to the passage of this act, I am perfectly willing that he or she shall be included within its provisions. But I think it is right to exclude such as have not filed their intentions before that time. I have felt it my duty to offer this amendment, and I hope it will be the pleasure of the committee to accept it; but if not, of course I shall not be found murmuring against the will of the majority. I offer it, however, in good faith, and leave it in the hands of the committee.

Mr. DEAN. I am opposed to that amendment, because I think the section is a good deal better as it stands than it would be if so amended.

The question was taken; and the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk then read the seventh section of the bill.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. I propose, if it is in order, to amend this bill by the addition of a section to suspend the sales of the public lands and the granting of them to railroad companies. I understood the Chair to make a suggestion the other day that such an amendment would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to offer an additional section to the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would submit to the Chair whether the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana is germane to the bill, or has any connection with the granting of homesteads? If we open up the subject of railroad grants, where shall we end?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair merely understands the gentleman from Indiana as desiring to offer an additional section to the bill. Until the Chair hears the amendment read, he cannot decide whether it is in order or not.

Mr. LANE. I will state to the Chair, that I propose to add a section to the bill, suspending the sales of the public lands hereafter, and refusing to give to railroad companies one inch of the public domain, reserving it for actual settlers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that it would be germane to offer an amendment to suspend the sale of the public lands until after the settlers shall have entered their lands. It will be a question for the committee whether they will adopt or reject an amendment of that sort.

Mr. JONES. Then we may as well give up the bill.

Mr. KERR. Well, give it up.

Mr. LANE. Understanding from the friends of the bill that the amendment which I offer may endanger the passage of the bill, I will withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then is on the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb.]

Mr. COBB. Before that comes up, I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the last section of the bill, which is as follows:

Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall be so construed as to authorize the class of persons provided for in the foregoing parts of this act who may not own one hundred and sixty acres of land, to enter, free of cost, of the public lands adjoining his or her farm, subject to private entry at $1 25 an acre, a quantity, when added to what they may now own, equal to one hundred and sixty acres: Provided, That he or she shall cultivate the whole, or part thereof.

That amendment is so obviously right, that I am sure the friends of the bill will not offer any opposition to it. If gentlemen will investigate the terms of the amendment, they will see that while it will do justice to a large and meritorious class of individuals, it may result greatly to the benefit of the General Government. For instance, here is an individual, perhaps an old and worn-out soldier, who has fought bravely the battles of his country; he has toiled until, having obtained fifty dollars, he has entered forty acres of land. He has made valuable improvements upon the land, built a domicile, and made himself a home. Whether poor or rich land, as it may be, he would rather, if he owned forty acres, take from the General Government the other one hundred and twenty acres adjoining, and be obligated to cultivate it all, or only a portion of it, as cultivation seems to be the principle on which the bill is founded. Then the Government saves forty acres. If he owns one hundred and twenty acres, he only takes forty, and the Government saves one hundred and twenty acres. The Government will always save the difference between what the man owns and one hundred and sixty acres. I see no injury to result to the Government, but I see much good to result to that poor class of settlers who have toiled to get forty acres, and on getting it, have labored on in the expectation of one day entering the adjoining land to the extent of one hundred and sixty acres in all. If you do not provide in this bill as I have suggested, you will compel the class of persons named to leave their homes to go upon the land of the Government, and obtain the one hundred and sixty acres provided for. Some person may sit down beside him and deprive him of that home which he may have expected to make him competent to support his family of eight or ten perhaps helpless children.

I call upon the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture to express whether, on investigation, he is not satisfied that it is right? If he is not, I am. I trust that this committee will give such a unanimous response as will make the poor way-worn heart throb with gratitude.

Mr. DAWSON. I think that the amendment of my friend from Alabama is a good one, and I hope it may be adopted.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman allow me one word in his five minutes?

Mr. DAWSON. I have closed my speech, and cannot do so.

Mr. COBB. I shall only add to what I have already said—

[Cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Further discussion is not in order on the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to amend the amendment by allowing the settler to enter one hundred and sixty acres besides what he already owns; and I do so for the purpose of saying that I believe the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is right. It is to permit the man who now owns a tract of forty, eighty, or one hundred and twenty acres, being less than one hundred and sixty acres, to enter so much of the public land adjoining as will make the entire tract one hundred and sixty acres, without removing out of the cabin which he may be occupying to live on the public land, but on condition that he shall cultivate for five years the whole, or a portion of the public land thus entered. I hope that the amendment may be adopted, believing it to be right. Having said thus much, with the permission of the committee I shall withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw his amendment to the amendment. Is there any objection?

There being no objection, the amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb,] and the Chair announced that it was agreed to.

Mr. MILLSON. I call for a division.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. I should like to hear the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama read again.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been adopted.

Mr. MILLSON. I called for a division before the decision was announced.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought that he heard a division called for, but was not positive. Shall the amendment be again read, so as that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Perkins] may propose an amendment?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to its being read again.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I should move, Mr. Chairman, to amend that amendment by striking out the words "paying $1 25 an acre," and leaving it as a grant.

Mr. COBB. I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the amendment as to the $1 25 per acre has no reference to buying the land, but that it merely refers to it as land subject to entry at that price.

Mr. PERKINS. I suggested merely that this bill should be altered so as say, "subject to entry at the minimum price." It would remove much difficulty.

Mr. HAMILTON. The land is proposed to be free of cost.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection to that; I accept the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Then upon that amendment I have a few words to say, if it be in order for me to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment is accepted, then it is not in order to speak on it.

Mr. PERKINS. I offered the amendment, and presumed I had a right to speak upon it. Do I understand the Chair to rule that it is not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. If the mover of the original amendment accepts the amendment to it, then it becomes a part of his amendment, and upon that debate is not in order.

Mr. SEYMOUR. The original amendment has not been opposed, and I think it is therefore in order to speak on the amendment to it.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman himself, who offered the original amendment, has accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana. It is, therefore, not in order to speak upon it.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. It is this: that although the amendment to the amendment may have been accepted by the gentleman who made the original proposition, yet it is, under the rule, a fair subject for debate; because the amendment, although accepted by the gentleman who offers the proposition, has not been accepted by the House, nor voted upon, and the object of these five-minute speeches is to allow gentlemen to explain propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee is not necessary, inasmuch as there is now opposition made to the original amendment, and it is in order to speak upon it. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Perkins] is therefore entitled to oppose the whole amendment as it now stands, and to explain his proposition.

Mr. PERKINS. I embrace the opportunity afforded by the amendment of expressing my views on the bill before the House. Representing a constituency to be deeply affected by its provisions, I regret that I cannot vote for it. I am in favor of this particular amendment, but opposed to the bill. It seems to me directly at war with constitutional principles I have been accustomed to hold sacred. I had supposed that the regulation of the social relations of the citizen were left by the Federal Constitution to the States, and that of commerce and foreign affairs to the General Government. I had supposed that, for the protection of the family hearth, the regulation of the household duties, and the descent and transfer of property, we were to look to the States, and not to the Federal Government. If I am mistaken in this I have strangely read the Constitution.

By the terms of this bill it is proposed to give, conditionally, to certain individuals, one hundred and sixty acres of land. These conditions are limited by no principle. If you can give it only to those who are married, you can give it only to those who have children. If you can give it only to those who are of the age of fourteen, as the original bill proposed, or eighteen, or twenty-one, as is now proposed, you may assign the limit at fifty or eighty years of age. In fact, there is no limit but the charitable discretion of Congress. If you can make this land exempt from taxes for five years, and protect it from mortgage for the payment of just debts for the same time, why not for twenty or fifty years? If the General Government has power thus to exempt capital and its increment from the operation of State law within the limits of a State, what confines the exemption to this species of property?

The effect of the bill will be to bring the General Government to bear directly upon the people of the States, making itself deeply and sensibly felt in all the relations of life, while the State law, in its peculiar province, will be inoperative. Against such an annihilation of State influence I earnestly protest. For the poor man who goes out into the woods and creates for himself a home I have great respect. Let him have his eighty acres free of expense, but burden it with no conditions of serfdom. He will have more than paid for his eighty acres by the labor of one year. Let him dispose of it as he pleases.

By this bill you propose to give one hundred and sixty acres of land, provided it is occupied and cultivated. Now, if that provision is designed for the benefit of the poor man, I ask, if it is possible for such a person to cultivate one hundred and sixty acres? If not, then, instead of peopling the West, over which is rolling the great tide of civilization, bearing along with it court-houses, schools, and churches, at the rate of sixteen miles

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MARCH 7, 1854.

NEW SERIES....No. 35.

a year, you are providing against its settlement. You dot it over with individuals, one to every one hundred and sixty acres; and what becomes of the excess of land that he cannot cultivate? The really poor man will stand upon this domain without the means of cultivating it. You will have stripped him of credit to procure even a spade to dig the soil. He cannot mortgage the land, for it is exempted from seizure. He cannot get personal credit, for his person is already in some sort mortgaged to the Government. The law requires him to occupy and cultivate, and he must remain stationary upon the land for five years. Under other circumstances he might, if a mechanic, pursue his trade or hire out his services, and by labor get that which would make profitable the one hundred and sixty acres.

These are some, but by no means all, of my objections to this bill; and as I cannot discuss them in the five minutes allowed me, I only intimate what I would desire to say had I more time.

The question then recurred upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

A VOICE. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to the reading of the amendment again. It has already been read two or three times.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state, that, since the amendment was last read it has been modified; the Clerk will therefore read the amendment again.

Mr. COBB. I accepted an amendment to my amendment; and that is the modification to which the Chair refers. I now propose to withdraw my acceptance.

A VOICE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was then read, as follows:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be so construed as to authorize the class of persons provided for in the foregoing part of this act, who may not own one hundred and sixty acres of land, to enter, free of cost, any of the public lands adjoining his or her farm, subject to entry at the minimum price per acre, a quantity, when added to what they may now own, be equal to one hundred and sixty acres, provided he or she shall cultivate the whole or a part thereof.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If there is no further amendment I propose that the committee rise.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I rise now for the purpose of inquiring, as I have not had much experience in the business of legislation, what becomes of the amendment which I proposed, and which has been printed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inform the gentleman from Indiana, that one substitute for the bill has been already offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB.] That has not been acted upon, and another substitute cannot now be offered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amendment I offered is not a substitute, but was offered as an amendment to the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It was merely presented in the House by unanimous consent, and ordered to be printed. What is the amendment of the gentleman?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It proposes to strike out the proviso of the last section, which reads as follows:

"Provided, however, That all persons entering land under the provisions of this act, shall, as near as may be practicable in making such entries, be confined to each alternate quarter section, and to land subject to private entry: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to impair or interfere in any manner whatever with existing preemption rights?"

and insert the amendment which I proposed, and which has already been printed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana proposes to strike out the proviso of the last section, and insert in lieu thereof, what will now be read by the Clerk.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will submit to the Chair this question of order, whether it is not too late to offer the amendment now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that it would be in order. If an additional section had been offered and adopted, then it would not have been in order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I simply propose to devote a few minutes of my time—

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment must be first reported by the Clerk.

The amendment was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

Strike out the proviso from the seventh section, and insert the following:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all persons entering land under the provisions of this act, shall, in making such entries, be confined to the lands hereinafter designated and set apart for that purpose in the — sections of this bill.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That a board of commissioners shall be appointed by the President of the United States, whose duty it shall be, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to employ the necessary engineers, and provide for all other necessary means to prosecute the surveys already commenced, or cause to be made other and all necessary surveys, for the establishment and permanent location of one or more—not, however, to exceed the number of three—railroad routes, from commercial points on the Gulf of Mexico or the Mississippi river to commercial points in California and Oregon, on the most practicable, suitable, and direct routes between such points; having due regard, in the location of such routes, to the prospective as well as present commercial interests of the country; such survey to be prosecuted to completion as soon as practicable after the passage of this act.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That such commissioners shall be appointed with due regard to the survey and permanent location of three lines of railroad, as aforesaid, if found practicable. They shall, in each corps of engineers in this act provided for, appoint one to be designated the chief engineer. And when, in the judgment of said commissioners, and each one, or either, of said chief engineers, respectively, a practicable route shall have been found and designated, and the necessary surveys to determine its permanent location shall have been completed, all the necessary maps and profiles shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and by him be caused to be recorded; and when so recorded, such shall be deemed the permanent location of such road or roads, and shall not thereafter be changed in such manner as materially to alter the location of such road or roads, except by act of Congress.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That when such routes are surveyed in manner aforesaid, and permanently located and recorded, the office of said commissioners shall be abolished. Said commissioners shall be allowed the sum of — dollars per day, besides their necessary expenses, while actually employed in the discharge of their duties.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That there shall be, and hereby is, granted the right of way for such railroad or roads throughout the whole extent thereof over the public domain, of sufficient width for a double-track railroad; not, however, to exceed two hundred feet in width. And there shall be reserved from all the other uses contemplated by this bill, sufficient width of land along such railroad or roads for a free common wagon road, of such construction as Congress may at any time hereafter provide for; such wagon road not to exceed one hundred feet in width.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That so soon as either one or more of the said railroad lines are or are permanently established and located, in manner aforesaid, the President of the United States shall cause the public land to be surveyed into townships, sections, and quarter sections, in strict conformity with the manner in which the public lands are now surveyed, to the distance of at least forty miles on each side of said railroads; every sixteenth section of which shall be reserved for school purposes, as under existing laws.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the said lands, within forty miles on each side of said railroads, shall be disposed of in the manner following: First, one third part thereof shall be set apart for donation to actual settlers, under the provisions of this bill. Second, one third part thereof shall be set apart, to be appropriated in aid of the construction of said railroads, as hereinafter provided. Third, one third part thereof shall be reserved by the General Government, to be disposed of as other public lands.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause said land to be so designated, for the several purposes specified in the thirteenth section of this act, as that one third part thereof shall be appropriated to each of said designated purposes in alternate quarter sections, as nearly as may be found practicable, so that that portion thereof hereby set apart for donation to actual settlers under the provisions of this bill may be selected by them in quarter sections equal to four quarter sections out of each three sections thereof.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That railroad companies may hereafter be incorporated upon such conditions as shall enable them to avail themselves of the provisions of this act, one or more on each of said lines of railroad; no one company, however, to be incorporated for the construction of less than one hundred miles of road. And the whole extent of such lines of railroad or railroads shall be laid off into divisions of one hundred miles each, as nearly as may be found practicable.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the shares of stock in each of said companies shall be two hundred dollars each; that when any holder of a share of said stock shall produce the proper certificates necessary to show that he has paid, in cash or its bona fide equivalent, the full amount thereof—that the same has been applied by such company to the actual construction and equipment of such railroad, and that such railroad is finished and in actual operation throughout an entire division of one hundred miles—such holder of stock, upon the production of such certificates to the proper Department of the Government, shall, for each such share of stock, be entitled to a land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, upon any of the unoccupied land herein appropriated to that purpose, and in the manner and subject to the restrictions herein provided.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the existing preemption laws shall be extended and applied to that portion of the said lands forty miles each side of said railroad or roads which shall not have been designated in manner aforesaid for donation to actual settlers, as hereinabove provided, for the protection of the rights of such of the stockholders in each of said companies as shall, by actual settlement and improvement thereon, entitle themselves to a preemption claim, as also the rights of such preemptors as may have settled upon the residue, or every third quarter section thereof, herein reserved by the United States.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That any bona fide holder of any such land warrant may locate the same upon one hundred and sixty acres of said land so surveyed, forty miles on each side of said railroad or roads, to be selected in quarter sections, equal to four quarter sections, out of each three sections, as above provided, in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, with the proper provisions for the protection of the interests and rights of those who may entitle themselves to preference in such location by virtue of their preemption claims as above provided; each holder of such land warrants being authorized to locate the same upon any of the unoccupied portion of said lands set apart for this purpose, only within the limits of the length of that division of said railroad or roads within which the certificates of stock shall have issued upon which such warrants shall have been granted; and preference in such location shall be given in the order of the date of the payment as aforesaid of each of such shares of stock.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That the United States Government reserves the perpetual right to transport the United States mails upon such railroads free of charge; and also reserves the power in the General Government, from time to time, to establish a maximum tariff of rates of toll within which said companies shall be limited.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not germane, and therefore rules it out of order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think if the Chair will examine the amendment he will not so decide.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the ruling that was had when the homestead bill was under consideration during the last Congress. An amendment was offered, proposing to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands; and I recollect very well that I, myself, being then upon the floor, raised the question of order, that the amendment was not germane to the subject under consideration. The Chair sustained the point of order, and no appeal was taken from his decision. Under that decision the Chair now decides that an amendment proposing to add to this bill a provision granting the right of way to various railroads to the Pacific ocean, is not germane to the bill under consideration, and therefore not in order. Does the gentleman from Indiana appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If I can state the grounds of my appeal I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal will not be debatable. The gentleman can, however, make a brief statement of the grounds of his appeal.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the proviso at the end of the original bill. It is—

"That all persons entering land under the provisions of this act, shall, as near as may be practicable in making such entries, be confined to each alternate quarter-section, and to land subject to private entry: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to impair or interfere in any manner whatever with existing preemption rights."

This proviso is intended to designate the manner in which the entries shall be made, and the grounds upon which they are to be made. Now, if the amendment which I have offered be examined, it will be discovered that it proposes to make the applications of the provisions of this bill to a specific district of the public domain. It points out, as the basis upon which these locations are to be made, certain lines of railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific. After making this application of the provisions of the bill to the section of country designated, it prescribes the limits of the application to within four miles on either side of these surveys. Now, I ask if there can be any question of order as to the pertinency of the proposed amendment to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

The question was then put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" and decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained; and the amendment ruled to be out of order.

Mr. BENNETT. I move to strike out the first proviso in the last section, and to insert the following:

Provided, That all persons entering lands under the provisions of this act shall be confined in making such entries, to lands which now are, or may hereafter be surveyed, and which are, at the time of such entry, surveyed for sale, and subject to private entry; and not more than one half of any section shall be selected, or entered, under this act.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to know whether the gentleman means the last section in the printed bill, or in that which the committee have inserted at the end of the bill?

Mr. BENNETT. I offer this amendment in good faith. The object of it is to make the language of the bill more definite. The bill now provides that the locations under this act shall be, as far as may be practicable, in alternate quarter sections. Now that language is very indefinite, and never can be carried into effect. My amendment makes it more definite, still carrying out the object of the friends of the bill. My amendment also confines the entries to lands that have been surveyed. I do not know whether that provision is already in the bill, but I think it ought to be adopted.

The question was then taken on Mr. BENNETT's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the committee rise, and report the bill and the amendments to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute of the gentleman from Alabama is still pending.

Mr. GROW. I desire to offer a substitute for the bill, and I will state the points in which it differs from the bill as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama must first be considered.

Mr. GROW. I thought it had been disposed of.

Mr. COBB. I am willing that the gentleman's substitute shall be considered before mine.

Mr. HENN. I would suggest to those gentlemen who have offered substitutes—and I am one of the number—that we should all withdraw them, and pass the bill in its present shape. I am willing to withdraw mine.

Mr. GROW. I cannot agree to that.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I ask the Chair if it is in order for any member, after he has offered amendment after amendment to the original bill, to introduce a substitute, and go through the same formalities with that, and then to offer another substitute and go through the same formalities with that, and so on to the end of time, merely for the sake of making Buncombe speeches here?

Mr. HAMILTON. I call the gentleman to order. He is clearly out of order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I presume that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] can offer his substitute in lieu of the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB?]

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute of the gentleman from Alabama must be read.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I wish to ask a question of the Chair: Is not every substitute amendable line by line?

The CHAIRMAN. Each substitute is amendable section by section.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Just as the original bill has been?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; the same.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Well, I want the House to understand what is being done.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Strike out all after the title of the bill, and insert—

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any free white person, or any single white person citizen of the United States, or any citizen of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, free of cost, one hundred and sixty acres, either in the States or Territories, of any vacant surveyed agricultural lands not reserved or appropriated, and which shall not interfere with any existing rights, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, upon application to the register of the land office in which he or she is about to make such entry, be permitted to enter the quantity of land already specified: Provided however, That no certificate shall be given or patent issue therefor until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry; and if, at the expiration of such time, the person making such entry, or, if he be dead, his widow, or, in case of her death, his heirs or devisee, or in case of the widow making such entry, her heirs or devisee, in case of her death, shall prove by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they, have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land, and still reside upon the same, and have not alienated the same, or any part thereof; then, in such case, he, she, or they, shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided for by law: And provided further, That in case of the death of both father and mother before the issuing of the patent, leaving a child or children under twenty-one years of age, the right and the fee shall inure to the benefit of said child or children, and the executor, administrator, or guardian, may, at any time within two years after the death of the surviving parent, and in accordance with the laws of the State or Territories where the land lies, sell said lands for the benefit of said children, but for no other purpose; and the purchaser shall acquire the absolute title by the purchase, and be entitled to a patent from the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the register of the land office shall note all such applications on the tract-books and plats of his office, and keep a register of all such entries, and make return thereof to the General Land Office, together with the proof upon which they have been founded.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if, at any time after filing application, as required in the second section of this act, and before the expiration of the five years aforesaid, it shall be proven, after sixty days' notice in writing served upon the person, and to the satisfaction of the register of the land office, that the person having filed such application shall have actually changed his or her residence, or abandoned said entry for more than six months at any one time, then, and in that event, the land so entered shall revert back to the Government, and be disposed of as other public lands now are by law, subject to an appeal to the General Land Office.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That no individual shall be permitted to make more than one entry under the provisions of this act; and that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby required to prepare and issue such rules and regulations, consistent with this act, as shall be necessary and proper to carry its provisions into effect; and that the registers and receivers of the several land offices shall be entitled to receive the same compensation for any lands patented under the provisions of this act that they are now entitled to receive when the same quantity of land is entered with money; one half to be paid by the person making the application at the time of so doing, and the other half on the issuing of the certificate by the person to whom it may be issued: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to interfere with any valid claim to a preemption right, nor with the perfection of title to any suspended entry or location made under and by virtue of any previous act of Congress: And provided further, That in all cases, under the provisions of this act, there shall be a right of appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and thence, as in other cases, to the Secretary of the Interior.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the lands of the United States which shall have been in market for ten years or upwards, prior to the time of application to enter the same, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at the price of one dollar per acre; and all of the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for fifteen years or upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at seventy-five cents per acre; and all of the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for twenty years or upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at fifty cents per acre; and all of the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for twenty-five years or upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at twenty-five cents per acre; and all of the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for thirty years or more, shall be subject to sale at twelve and a half cents per acre: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not extend to lands reserved to the United States in acts granting lands to States for railroads or other internal improvements, or for any other purposes.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That upon every reduction in price under the provisions of this act, the occupant and settler upon the lands shall have the right of preemption at such graduated price, upon the same terms, conditions, restrictions, and limitations, to which the next public lands of the United States are now subject, until the next graduation or reduction shall take place; and if not so purchased, shall again be subject to the right of preemption for twelve months, as before, and so on from time to time, as reductions shall take place: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to interfere with any right which has or may accrue by virtue of any act granting preemption to actual settlers upon public lands.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That any person applying to enter any of the aforesaid lands under the provisions of this act, shall be required to make affidavit before the register or receiver of the proper land office that he or she enters the same for his or her own use, and for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, or for the use of an adjacent farm or plantation owned or occupied by him or herself, and, together with said entry, he or she has not acquired from the United States under the provisions of this act more than three hundred and twenty acres, according to the established surveys; and if any person or persons taking such oath or affidavit shall swear falsely in the premises, he or she shall be subject to all the pains and penalties of perjury.

Mr. COBB. I desire to make a few remarks in explanation of my substitute for the bill; first, the provisions of my amendment or substitute are incorporated in the bill which has been pretty well acted upon. True, there are a few sections in the bill which I oppose—particularly that authorizing foreigners, after the passage of the act, to become citizens, by filing their declaration. But, take the bill on the whole, it is a better bill than mine as now amended. I like it best because it provides for females, and for all persons having already forty acres of land, or less than a hundred and sixty; and I shall go for the bill just acted upon heart and soul. The provisions that have been attached to this bill—

Mr. CLINGMAN. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is bound to speak in favor of his own amendment or substitute, and has no right to go off into eulogy of the bill itself.

Mr. COBB. I am that much in favor of my own amendment, that if it shall so turn out that we shall not get the graduation clause attached to this measure passed now, I shall then go for my own. But, knowing that we have a special order coming up immediately on the heels of the passage of this measure, which does absolutely provide for the graduation and reduction of the prices of the public lands, and therefore covering the latter part of my bill; and the first part of mine being more perfect as presented in the gentleman's bill, I shall support the bill as ordered by the committee; and I withdraw for the present my substitute, relying on the next bill which is to come up as a special order as the one in which to provide for the graduation and reduction of the prices of the public lands.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I object to the withdrawal of the gentleman's substitute, because in that case another can be offered; and I want to have this nailed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair informs the gentleman from Illinois, that even after this substitute should be rejected by the committee it would be in order to offer another.

A MEMBER. Is it in order to speak against it? The CHAIRMAN. It is. The gentleman from Illinois has a right to speak against it if he desires to do so.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I hope that when the reporter makes up the proceedings of to-day for the Globe to-morrow, he will set me down as opposed to the custom of introducing bills in this House, and then killing them dead by speaking.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama proposes to withdraw his substitute. Is it the unanimous consent of the committee that he be permitted to do so?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I now move to strike out the first section of the bill, and I do so merely for the purpose of saying to the committee, that if there be any substitute adopted, every amendment that was made to the original bill will be lost, and not one of them will be reported to the House.

Mr. KEITT. I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order in committee.

Mr. KEITT. Then I move to strike out the first section.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What has become of the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] has asked permission to withdraw it.

Mr. STEPHENS. I object to his doing so.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection has been made to the gentleman withdrawing his substitute. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] proposes to strike out the first section.

Mr. KEITT. I have not, Mr. Chairman, engaged in this contest, to embarrass this bill by mere parliamentary tactics, nor do I intend to do so. But I desire to express to this committee my general repugnance to the entire character of the measure. I would do nothing in this House to violate those principles which are the basis of our Federal structure. The object of this bill is intrusively to thrust the Federal Government between the States and their citizens. All other Governments rest upon the idea that the people are the means, and the Government the end; ours, upon the idea that the Government is the means, and the people the end; and the object is to develop individuality. The tendency of this bill is to destroy that, and to make the people of the United States look, not only to Government as the author of all their blessings, but to look to the Federal Government almost exclusively. I maintain that the Government does not create property, but only protects it. If this Government uses the common property as an elemosynary fund, out of which to distribute favors, it does not do it by its power of creating property, but by a departure from the principle that its duty is simply to protect. It gives away unfairly to some that which belongs to all. I oppose the bill upon those two simple grounds.

Now, having briefly stated my views, I am willing to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS. I object. If the House expects to get to a vote upon this bill, the best way is to permit the withdrawal of no amendment, but to vote upon them, and in that way get through the bill.

The question was then put upon the motion to strike out the first section of the substitute; and it was decided in the negative.

The question then recurring upon the substitute proposed by Mr. COBB, it was put, and decided in the negative.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. GROW. I propose the following substitute for the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. I rise to a question of order. It is not competent, in the present stage of this bill, to offer any further amendment to it. The substitute just voted upon was to strike out the entire bill. The House having so voted, it is equivalent to an agreement that the bill shall stand as it is, and therefore it is not in order to amend it further.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule which governs the matter will be reported to the committee.

The 53d rule was then read, as follows:

"Any member may call for the division of the question, which shall be divided if it comprehend propositions in substance so distinct, that one being taken away a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House. A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible; but a motion to strike out being lost shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is aware that, under parliamentary law, a motion to strike out being once lost is equivalent to agreeing to that portion which the body had refused to strike out. But, under the special provisions of this rule, which says that "a motion to strike out being lost shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert," it is in order to offer an additional substitute for the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. In my opinion, it was founded upon parliamentary law.

The CHAIRMAN. As a question of parliamentary law, the gentleman from Georgia would be correct; but a special exception is made in this case by the rules of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers the following amendment to the bill.

The amendment was then read, as follows, by the Clerk:

A BILL to encourage agriculture, and provide a homestead, out of the public domain, of one hundred and sixty acres of land for every head of a family, on condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, or who shall have filed a declaration of intention to become such, as required by the naturalization laws of the same, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, free of cost, one-quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public land, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, and after the same shall have been surveyed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, upon application to the register of the land office in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the said register that he or she is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States; or, if not a citizen, that he has filed a declaration of intention to become such, as required by the naturalization laws of the same, and that the land so entered is to be made his or her place of abode, and the means, in whole or in part, of supporting a family; and upon making the affidavit as above specified, and filing the same with the register, he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the quantity of land already specified: Provided, however, That no certificate shall be given, or patent issued therefor, until the expiration of six years from the date of such entry; and if, at the expiration of such time, or at any time thereafter, the person making such entry, or, if he or she be dead, then his widow, or, in case of her death, then his or her heirs or devisees shall prove to the satisfaction of the register of said land office that he is a citizen of the United States, and that he, she, or they have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land from the time of entering the same, and still reside thereon, and have not alienated the same, or any part thereof, nor entered into any contract, bargain, or agreement, verbal or written, to dispose of the same, or any part thereof, then in such case he, she, or they, on payment of the sum of five dollars into the Treasury of the United States, shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided for by law: Provided further, That in case of the death of both father and mother, leaving an infant child or children under the age of twenty-one years, the right and the fee shall inure to the benefit of said infant child or children, and the executor, administrator, or guardian, may at any time within two years after the death of the surviving parent, and in accordance with the laws of the State in which said land may be situated, sell the same for the benefit of said infant or infants, but for no other purpose whatever; and the purchaser at such sale shall acquire the absolute title, and be entitled to a patent from the United States, on proof of the foregoing facts, and the payment into the Treasury of the United States of the sum herein specified.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if at any time after filing the affidavit, as required in the second section of this act, and before the expiration of the six years aforesaid, it shall be proven, after due notice to the settler, to the satisfaction of the register of the land office in which said land shall be situated, that the person having filed such affidavit has changed his or her actual residence, or that the said entry is or has been at any time abandoned, except in case of hostile invasion, or of actual service by the occupant in the Army or Navy of the country, in time of war, then in that case the land so entered shall revert to the Government, and be disposed of as other public lands are now disposed of by law.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all land acquired under the provisions of this act shall in no event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of the death of both father and mother, leaving minor children, one of whom takes upon him or herself the supervision and maintenance of the younger children, such person shall be considered as the head of a family, and entitled to all the rights, privileges, and benefits provided by this act.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the registers and receivers of the several land offices shall be entitled to receive the same compensation for any lands entered under the provisions of this act that they are now entitled to receive when the same quantity of land is entered with money, to be paid by the person making the application, at the time of so doing.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the register of the several land offices shall note all such applications on the tract-books and plats of his office, and keep a register of all such entries, and make return thereof to the General Land Office, together with the proof upon which they have been founded.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all persons entering land under the provisions of this act shall be confined to land subject to private entry; and that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to impair or in any way interfere with existing preemption rights.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That no individual shall be permitted to make more than one entry under the provisions of this act, and that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby required to prepare and issue such rules and regulations consistent with this act as shall be necessary and proper to carry its provisions into effect.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That no land hereafter surveyed by authority of the Government, except mineral lands, and such reservations as have been or may be at any time made by the Government for its own use, shall be exposed, by proclamation or in any other way, to public sale, but shall be subject to private entry only, by actual settlers alone who make such entry for the purpose of cultivation.

Mr. GROW. Having the same object in view as the chairman of the committee [Mr. DAWSON] who reported the homestead bill, I offer this substitute, with no disposition to embarrass the measure, or in any way to retard its progress. I do it simply for this reason: I believe the substitute which I have offered covers all the amendments which have been adopted by the committee, with some other provisions that are better calculated, in my judgment, to guard the Government against fraud and imposition, as well as protect the settler. The first point of difference between the substitute and the original bill is as to the kind of citizens who are to receive the benefit of it. I simply propose that a man shall declare his intention to become a citizen of the United States before he can make an entry under this bill, and that he shall become naturalized before he can receive his patent. That is all the restriction, so far as the native-born or naturalized citizen is concerned. Why should we make any other distinction? Why will you grant to a man who comes to your shores to-day privileges that you deny to one who comes to-morrow? What matters it when the emigrant lands, if he takes upon himself the burdens and duties of citizenship? Should he not be entitled to all its benefits?

Another point of difference is, the original bill provides, if at any time after filing the affidavit required in the second section, and before the expiration of the five years, the settler shall have abandoned his entry for more than six months at any one time, that then the land shall revert back to the Government. I provide that it shall not be abandoned at all, except in case of hostile invasion, or of service by the occupant in the Army or Navy of the United States in time of war.

Another point of difference which covers the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. BRIDGES] is, that the person applying for the benefit of this act is required to prove that the land so entered is to be made his or her place of abode, and the means in whole or part of supporting a family. I also require before the patent is issued, that the person so applying shall prove to the satisfaction of the register of the land office that he or she is a citizen of the United States, and that they have not entered into any contract, bargain, or agreement, verbal or written, to dispose of the same or any part thereof; and that then, in such case, he, she, or they, on payment of five dollars into the Treasury of the United States, shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided for by law.

I propose to make these lands pay the expense of their transfer and survey. While the settler should not be required to pay anything for the land itself, he should pay the expense of survey and cost of transferring the titles. That has been my position from the first; and in my remarks on this subject at the last Congress, I said:

"To prevent conflicts as to what portions are appropriated to each individual's use, it is necessary that his claim should be defined; and this is best done by a survey. Therefore it is proper that the settler should pay the Government the cost of survey; for the survey, as conducted by the land office, is the best and most convenient mode of laying off lands."

That makes the system self-sustaining. It is, therefore, just to all the interests of the country. By it you do justice to the men who cannot and wish not to leave their present homes for a settlement under this bill; and you do no injustice to the settler, for you take from him nothing but what he would have to pay some other citizen if he did not pay the Government: that is, for the survey of his lands. I propose to add a new section to the bill—

That in all cases of the death of both father and mother, leaving minor children, one of whom takes upon him or herself the supervision and maintenance of the younger children, such person shall be considered as the head of a family, and entitled to all the rights, privileges, and benefits provided by this act.

And another additional section confining all sales of the public lands hereafter to actual settlers.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to strike out the entire bill, and insert the substitute offered by him. I am opposed to his amendment.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. GROW. I move, as an additional section of the original bill, the following:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That in all cases of the death of both father and mother, leaving minor children, one of whom takes upon him or herself the supervision and maintenance of the younger children, such person shall be considered as the head of a family, and entitled to all the rights, privileges, and benefits provided by this act.

I have but a word to say upon the subject of this amendment, for I presume it will strike the good sense of every member of this committee as equally meritorious with any provision of the bill. I will simply state, that it provides that, in case of the death of both father and mother, and one of the brothers or sisters takes upon himself, or herself, the duty of providing for the maintenance of the minor children, that brother or sister shall be entitled to make an entry under this bill, and to all the rights and privileges provided by it for heads of families.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The bill now provides that in case of the death of father and mother, the lands shall be sold for the benefit of the minor children.

Mr. GROW. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee having yielded the floor altogether no further debate is in order.

The question was taken; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to propose an amendment. I have no copy of the bill before me, but I call attention to that provision of the bill which—

The CHAIRMAN. The bill having been read through by sections no amendment is in order, except as an additional section. Does the gentleman propose an additional section?

Mr. McMULLIN. Will it be in order to renew the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GROW?]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been rejected by the committee, and cannot again be offered.

Mr. McMULLIN. Will it be in order to move to strike out the last section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That section has been agreed to by the committee, and no motion to strike it out can be entertained.

Mr. McMULLIN. Will it be in order to move the substitute offered by the gentleman, all except the last section?

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment will be in order.

Mr. McMULLIN. Well, sir, I submit that as an amendment to the original bill, and upon it I desire to offer a few remarks. I regret that the original bill, as reported by the committee, contains a provision which gives this land to all the citizens of the United States over twenty-one years of age. I should have greatly preferred it if it had been modified to correspond with the original bill reported to the Thirty-Second Congress, and that its benefits should have been confined to those who own no land. But, inasmuch as this committee have thought proper to agree to this bill with this provision, objectionable as it is, I expect to give it my support. I regret that I was not present to hear the argument of my distinguished colleague against this bill. I expect to stand solitary and alone from the great State of Virginia in its support.

Mr. HENDRICKS, (interrupting.) Are these remarks in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia must confine himself to the explanation of his amendment.

Mr. McMULLIN. The amendment covers the whole subject of the bill, and my remarks were, therefore, strictly in order. I think the gentleman from Indiana was a little out of order himself in interrupting me to make such a point of order.

I hold, in the first place, that it is perfectly competent for Congress to pass such a bill as this. The Constitution says that Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations concerning the territory and other property of the United States. The constitutional objection raised by gentlemen to this bill does not, therefore, weigh one feather with me. I hold that Congress has clearly the constitutional power to pass this bill.

I hold, further, that it is not only constitutional, but expedient, and called for by the best interests of the old States. I regret to differ upon this point from such a large number of gentlemen representing the old States of the Union.

Congress has given lands time and again to soulless corporations, and if we have the power to give lands to soulless corporations, have we not also the power to give lands to the honest and industrious citizens of the country? Clearly we have. If I had time, I think I could show the committee that, as a financial question, it is the interest of the Government to make this disposition of the public lands. By this bill, you invite all the citizens of the country to take possession of a part of the lands, and in that way the old States will come in for their share of them.

But one of the objections made by my colleague and others to the bill is that it would depopulate the old States and build up the new States. Now if, under the operation of this bill, Virginia loses some of her industrious, hard-working citizens, who will they be? Sir, they will be those industrious, hard-working men who now contribute one third of their labor to the land-owners of the country. Let them go to the new States and have homes of their own on which they can devote all their time and labor instead of paying one third of it to the landed aristocracy of the country.

If I had time, I could show that this bill will also enable that class of the population to pay into the National Treasury a larger amount of money than they now pay. Why? Because they will be enabled to purchase more fine goods and manufactures than they can now purchase, and in that way they will add to the revenue of the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. I think that the bill has been amended enough, and I hope that this amendment will not prevail.

The question was then taken on Mr. McMULLIN's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to offer an amendment. I have written it hastily, and it may not, perhaps, be considered germane to the bill; but in order that the Chair may be able to decide that question, I will read it. It is as follows:

Add as an additional section to the bill:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the alternate sections of land for which distribution is not provided in this bill, shall be set apart, so as to provide for the grant of one hundred and sixty acres of land to all the soldiers of the war of 1812, or their surviving widows and children; and also to any of those who were engaged in any of the Indian wars since 1790.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I supposed the Chair would do so.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I now move that the committee rise, and report the bill and the amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 37, known as the homestead bill, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, and ask the concurrence of the House therein.

Mr. DAWSON. I call for the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The call for the previous question was seconded; there being, on a division—ayes 87, noes not counted.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the propriety of letting the bill lie over until to-morrow, that the amendments may be printed.

Mr. DAWSON. There are very few amendments, and we can act on them now as well as to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves, by unanimous consent, that the bill and amendments lie over till to-morrow, that the latter may be printed.

[Cries of "I object!"]

Mr. DEAN. Territorial business has precedence to-morrow.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the amendments made in committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I propose that the Clerk read the amendments, and that those which are not asked to be separately voted on, be voted on en masse.

The SPEAKER. As a matter of convenience, it is proposed that the various amendments by the committee shall be read over, that if any one desires a separate vote upon any one of the amendments he shall rise in his place and say so, and a separate vote shall be had, and that the remaining ones on which no separate vote is asked shall be voted on en masse. Is it the pleasure of the House to take that course?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHE. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, after the House has passed through the different amendments, we have not a right to demand a separate vote upon the different sections of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to amend the bill when the House is brought to vote upon it under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. ASHE. I do not want to amend the bill. I want the question divided.

The SPEAKER. The effect of the previous question, if ordered, would be to cut off all division of the question.

Mr. ASHE. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the previous question cuts off all division of the question?

The SPEAKER. It cuts off the right to amend the original bill, and brings the House to vote directly upon the amendments proposed by the committee, and then upon the engrossment of the bill as a whole.

A MEMBER. Not by sections?

The SPEAKER. Not by sections.

Mr. ASHE. Then, Mr. Speaker, in justice to myself, I give notice that I shall be compelled to demand a separate vote on all the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

"In the first section, after the word 'any,' insert words 'free white.'"

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On that amendment I demand a separate vote, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GOODE. Is it in order now to make a motion that this bill be laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion is in order.

Mr. GOODE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I am disposed to test the sense of the House, whether they are determined to pass the bill at all. I wish to know whether there be a majority in its favor.

Mr. DAWSON. I call the gentleman from Virginia to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia must remember that debate under the operation of the previous question is not in order.

Mr. GOODE. I am not very familiar with the rules of the House, but I should like to be allowed to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can only be permitted to do so by the unanimous consent of the House.

There was objection.

Mr. GOODE. Then I move to lay the bill on the table; and on that proposition I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 60, nays 124; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Aiken, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Barksdale, Belcher, Bennett, Bocock, Boyce, Brooks, Caskie, Chastain, Clingan, Colquitt, Craig, Crocker, Cumming, Dent, Dickinson, Dowdell, Edmunds, Edmundson, Faulkner, Franklin, Fuller, Goode, Hamilton, Wiley P. Harris, Haven, Hibbard, Hill, Hunt, J. Glancy Jones, Kerr, Kidwell, Kittredge, Kurtz, Letcher, McNair, McQueen, May, Smith, Miller, Milton, Morrison, John Perkins, Phillips, Pratt, Puryear, Reese, Rogers, Rowe, Ruffin, Seward, Seymour, Shaw, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Alexander H. Stephens, Tracy, and Daniel B. Wright—60.

NAYS.—Messrs. Abernethy, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Banks, Benson, Benton, Breckinridge, Bridges, Buzz, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chase, Chrisman, Churchill, Clark, Cobb, Corwin, Cox, Culom, Cutting, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dean, De Witt, Dick, Disney, Drum, Dunbar, Eastman, Edgerton, Elliott, Ellison, English, Ewing, Farley, Florence, Gamble, Giddings, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Grey, Grow, Andrew J. Harlan, Harrison, Hastings, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Howe, Hughes, Ingersoll, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Knox, Lane, Lindsey, Lindsley, McCulloch, McDougal, McMullin, Macy, Matteson, Maxwell, Mayall, Meacham, Middleswarth, John C. Miller, Morgan, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Oids, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Peckham, Pennington, Phelps, Preston, Pringle, Ready, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Shannon, Shower, Singleton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hestor L. Stevens, Stratton, Austin, Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Trout, Tweed, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walbridge, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Hendrick B. Wright, Yates, and Zollicoffer—124.

So the motion to lay the bill on the table was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the amendment which has been reported.

Mr. ASHE. A few minutes ago I demanded a separate vote on each amendment. I now withdraw that demand, seeing that there is a decided majority in the House in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER. There has been, however, a separate vote demanded on the first amendment, and the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The amendment reported above was again read.

The question was then taken and there were—yeas 101, nays 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Barksdale, Benton, Boeck, Breckinridge, Bridges, Brooks, Bugg, Canthers, Caskey, Chastain, Chrisman, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Cook, Cox, Craig, Cullum, Cunningham, John G. Davis, Dent, Disney, Dowdell, Dunbar, Edmundson, English, Ewing, Faulkner, Florence, Franklin, Fuller, Green, Greenwood, Grey, Hamilton, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hill, Houston, Hunt, Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kidwell, Kurtz, Letcher, Lindsey, Lindley, McDougall, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Maxwell, May, Middlesworth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Millson, Mordecai Oliver, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Preston, Ready, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Rogers, Rowe, Ruffin, Seward, Shaw, Shower, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, William R. Smith, Snodgrass, Solters, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard R. Stanton, Vail, Vansant, Walbridge, Warren, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Zollicoffer—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Appleton, Banks, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Campbell, Carpenter, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chase, Clark, Corwin, Crocker, Cutting, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dean, De Witt, Dick, Dickinson, Drum, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmunds, Ellison, Everhart, Farley, Gamble, Giddings, Goodrich, Grow, Hastings, Howe, Hughes, Daniel T. Jones, Kittredge, Knox, Lane, McCulloch, Macy, Matteson, Mayall, Meacham, Morgan, Morrison, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Oids, Andrew Oliver, Peckham, Pennington, Pratt, Pringle, Puryear, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Sapp, Seymour, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Tweed, Upham, Wade, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, and Yates—78.

So the amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER. If it be the pleasure of the House, the remaining amendments will be read; and any gentleman desiring a separate vote on any one of them will rise and announce his desire. The Clerk will report the second amendment.

The Clerk then continued to read the amendments; and the question being put upon those on which no separate vote was asked, they were agreed to.

The third amendment, upon which Mr. LANE, of Indiana, asked a separate vote, was then reported, as follows:

"Insert after the word 'lands,' in the sixth line of the first section, the words 'which may at the time the application is made, be subject to private entry at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre,' so that the clause will read:

"That any person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at twenty-one years of age, and a citizen of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, free of cost, one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public lands, which may, at the time the application is made, be subject to private entry at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre," &c.

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

The fourth amendment, upon which Mr. MILLSON had requested a separate vote, was then reported, as follows:

"Insert after the word 'family,' in the fifth line of the second section, the words 'or is twenty-one years of age,' so that the clause shall read:

"That the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, upon application to the register of the land office in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the said register that he or she is the head of a family, or is twenty-one years of age," &c.

Mr. MILLSON. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 97, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The fifth and last amendment was then read, as follows—at the end of the bill to insert the following:

"Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall be so construed as to authorize the class of persons provided for in the foregoing part of this act, who may not own one hundred and sixty acres of land, to enter free of cost any public lands adjoining his or her farm subject to entry at the minimum price, a quantity which, when added to what they may now own, shall be equal to one hundred and sixty acres; provided that he or she shall cultivate the whole or part thereof."

Mr. LETCHER. I call for the yeas and nays upon that amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. DAWSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON. I move the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill; which were ordered.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 107, nays 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Banks, Bennett, Benton, Breckinridge, Bridges, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chase, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clark, Cobb, Cook, Corwin, Cox, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dick, Disney, Drum, Dunbar, Eastman, Edgerton, Elliott, Ellison, English, Ewing, Farley, Florence, Gamble, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Grey, Grow, Andrew J. Harlan, Harrison, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Howe, Ingersoll, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Knox, Lane, Lindsey, Lindley, McCulloch, McMullin, Macy, Maxwell, Mayall, Middlesworth, John G. Miller, Morgan, Nichols, Norton, Oids, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Peckham, Pennington, Phelps, Preston, Pringle, Ready, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Russell, Sapp, Shannon, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Trout, Tweed, Vail, Vansant, Walbridge, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Hendrick B. Wright, Yates, and Zollicoffer—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Appleton, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Barksdale, Belcher, Benson, Boeck, Boyce, Brooks, Caskey, Chastain, Clingman, Colquitt, Craig, Crocker, Cunningham, Cutting, Thomas Davis, Dent, De Witt, Dickinson, Dowdell, Edmunds, Edmundson, Faulkner, Franklin, Fuller, Goode, Hamilton, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hibbard, Hill, Hunt, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kittredge, Kurtz, Letcher, McDougall, McQueen, Matteson, May, Meacham, Smith Miller, Millson, Morrison, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phillips, Pratt, Puryear, Rogers, Rowe, Ruffin, Sabin, Seward, Seymour, Shaw, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Tracy, Upham, Israel Washburn, and Daniel B. Wright—72.

So the bill was passed.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. DAWSON said: I wish to state that Mr. LATHAM, one of the members from California, who is not present on account of indisposition in his family, has requested me to state that if he had been here, he would have voted for the passage of this bill. I take great pleasure in stating that there was no man in this House a more devoted friend of the bill, and who was more anxious for its passage than the distinguished gentleman from California.

Mr. ORR also said: I was accidentally out of the House at the time the roll was called. Had I been present, I should have voted against the passage of this bill.

Mr. DAWSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The title to the bill was then read, as follows:

A bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move to amend the title of the bill as follows:

An act to dispose of the public lands in limited quantities, upon the condition of actual settlement and cultivation for five years.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Maryland move his amendment in lieu of the present title?

Mr. HAMILTON. I offer it in lieu of the present title.

Mr. JONES. I offer the following as an amendment in lieu of that offered by the gentleman from Maryland, and the present title, and upon it I call the previous question:

A bill to grant a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands to actual settlers.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was then taken upon Mr. JONES's amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the title, as amended, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the title, as amended, was agreed to, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I move that the House adjourn.

THE NEXT SPECIAL ORDER.

Mr. COBB. I want to call the attention of the House for a moment to the fact, that by their order the bill of the House (No. 1) in relation to the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands was made the special order, to immediately follow the one which we have had for some time under consideration. I would suggest to the House, inasmuch as we have many bills of importance upon our Calendar; inasmuch as the consideration of the deficiency bill and the general appropriation bills is pressed upon us, to say nothing of the territorial bills which we shall be called upon to consider, that we postpone, and, with the consent of the House, I will move to postpone the consideration of the special order for three weeks. That will give us time to dispose of other measures, perhaps equally important, which are pressing upon our consideration. So far as I am individually concerned, I should prefer that the bill to which I have referred should have immediate consideration; but I am aware that the House have been much fatigued with the consideration of one homestead bill, and I am not disposed to press them immediately to consider the other one, unless it be their wish. With a view, therefore, of accomplishing that object, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to postpone the consideration of the special order for three weeks.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I object.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

THE GARDINER CASE.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw the motion to adjourn, for the purpose of enabling me to ask the consent of the House to offer a resolution, to which I am quite sure there will be no objection.

Mr. LETCHER. I withdraw the motion, with the understanding that the gentleman will renew it as soon as his matter has been disposed of.

Mr. PERKINS. I will renew it. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution, which I ask may be read for information.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire into the propriety of directing legal proceedings to be instituted to recover any sum of money which may have been paid to any person out of the Treasury on the claim of Gardiner and Mears, under the Commission which adjudicated the claims on Mexico under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

There being no objection, the resolution was accordingly presented.

Mr. CUTTING. I hope the gentleman will take into consideration the propriety of adding a provision authorizing that committee to send for persons and papers. Unless they have this authority, it will be impossible for them to determine against whom to commence judicial proceedings.

Mr. PERKINS. I have no objection to that amendment, if the gentleman will move it.

Mr. CUTTING. I ask the gentleman to accept it as a part of his resolution. With that we shall be able to arrive at the object of the resolution.

Mr. PERKINS. I will accept the modification.

The resolution, as modified, was then reported to the House.

The question was taken; and the resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. In fulfillment of my promise to the gentleman from Virginia, I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HIBBARD. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw his motion for a moment, to enable me to introduce a single resolution of inquiry, to which, I apprehend, nobody will object.

Mr. LETCHER. I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn was submitted by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. PERKINS.] Does the gentleman withdraw it?

Mr. PERKINS. It is not in my power to withdraw it without the consent of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LETCHER. I am willing that it shall be withdrawn.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I withdraw it.

AMENDMENT OF THE BOUNTY LAND LAW.

Mr. HIBBARD. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws in relation to bounty lands that whenever an applicant for bounty land under any act shall die or may have died after filing in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions his application and evidence sufficient to substantiate the same, before the issue of any warrant thereon, the heirs of such applicant shall be entitled to receive a warrant for the same amount of land that the deceased would have been entitled to if living.

Mr. NOBLE. I desire to say that I was without the bar at the moment the vote was taken on the passage of the homestead bill, or I should have recorded my vote in favor of it.

Mr. WHEELER. I object to that.

Mr. HIBBARD. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken on Mr. CAMPBELL's motion, and it was agreed to; and, thereupon, the House, at twenty minutes past three o'clock, adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting the report of the Board of Inspectors of the Penitentiary of the District of Columbia for the year ending December 31, 1853; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

VOTE ON THE NEBRASKA BILL.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. President, I am desirous of making a brief explanation to the Senate in regard to myself. I was absent from my place, necessarily, when the vote on the passage of the Nebraska bill was taken on Saturday morning. I was severely indisposed at the time; and, as is well known to my friends, my general state of health for the last two or three weeks has not been good. I was over fatigued by the lateness of the hour, and having remained in the Senate till half past three o'clock, was utterly unable to remain any longer. I suppose it cannot be a matter of doubt with any of my brother Senators how I should have voted. Having non-concurred in the Committee on Territories, before the bill was brought into the Senate, on the question of reporting it; having expressed my opinions in full in opposition to the policy of the bill in the remarks which I had submitted to the Senate, and having voted in the negative on the test amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] proposing to declare the Missouri restriction "inoperative and void," it is hardly necessary to say, that if I had been here, my vote would have been recorded in the negative on the passage of the bill. Nevertheless, sir, as it is a matter of very great consequence and interest, I am desirous, with the permission of the Senate, which the Presiding Officer informs me can be given by unanimous consent, having my vote entered on the Journal against the bill. I will, therefore, venture to ask the favor of Senators to allow my vote to be thus recorded.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator make a motion?

Mr. EVERETT. I do. It requires, however, I suppose, unanimous consent.

Mr. CLAYTON. It was my design to record my vote in favor of the repeal of the eighth section of the act, which is called the Missouri compromise act, of 1820, and I voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] When I heard the speech of the gentleman over the way, [Mr. NORRIS,] who regarded this bill as a triumph of the doctrines of squatter sovereignty over the true principles of non-intervention, contained in the bill of 1848, I determined to record my vote against the passage of the bill. I remained here for that purpose until a very late hour; but I was sick, and was not able to remain until five o'clock in the morning. If the Senator from Massachusetts has leave to record his vote, I ask leave to record mine also.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator make any proposition?

Mr. EVERETT. The unanimous consent is asked to have the names recorded.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will read the 17th rule on the subject.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to know what has been the practice of the Senate heretofore? I shall not interpose any objection, if it has been usually accorded to Senators who are absent when important votes have been taken. I desire to know, therefore, whether it has been the custom to agree to such a proposition?

The PRESIDENT. The 17th rule is:

"When the yeas and nays shall be taken upon any question, in pursuance of the above rule, no member shall be permitted, under any circumstances whatever, to vote after the decision is announced from the Chair."

The Chair presumes that unanimous consent can do away with the operation and effect of this rule. It requires unanimous consent. The Chair does not understand the Senator from California [Mr. WELLER] to object.

Mr. WELLER. I interpose no objection.

The PRESIDENT. Then the votes will be recorded against the passage of the bill.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to ask the Presiding Officer, however, whether this has been generally done?

The PRESIDENT. I have been told that there has never been but one case, and that was the case of the Senator from Michigan the other day.

Mr. DAWSON. That was not allowed.

The PRESIDENT. I am informed that there is but one solitary precedent. If there be no objection, the Senator's names will be recorded.

Mr. DAWSON. I merely wish to make one objection as to the consequences growing out of the adoption of such a course. If we establish a precedent, the rule will be violated whenever we are constrained to force a measure through this body by sitting late at night. Gentlemen all know that on such occasions it will be much more pleasant to be at their lodgings than here, if they will have a right to record their votes by motion on the next day, or some subsequent day. Adopt such a practice, and we shall find ourselves without that attendance in the Senate which we ought to have when the Senate sits late at night; and very often we shall be found without a quorum. That was one of the difficulties to prevent which the rule was adopted. It is not in my nature, nor in my disposition, to oppose the wishes of any gentleman, and I will not do so now, as I shall find myself alone in it. But if I were to adhere to principle, and discharge my duty to the country and to the body, I should oppose it. But as these friends of mine were sick, and could not be here, perhaps it is better to suffer it to be done. But the occasion will have to be very extraordinary when I shall consent to it again.

Mr. CLAYTON. It will not affect the result.

Mr. ADAMS. There are other Senators who were not present on Saturday morning when the vote was taken, and are not present now, who I know would be very glad to have their names recorded on the other side. If we record one, of course it would be expected that the same right would be allowed to them. But I submit to the consideration of the Presiding Officer that the language of the rule which he has read is not like all other rules where unanimous consent will authorize a departure from them. Bills must be read upon three several days, unless by unanimous consent it is dispensed with. But the rule just read by the Chair declares, that under no circumstances whatever shall a person be permitted to vote after the result has been announced. Do not the words "by unanimous consent" come under "whatever?" It does seem to me unanimous consent cannot confer the power here. It was certainly intended by the language that under no circumstances whatever, by unanimous consent or by a majority, a departure from the rule should be authorized. I am not disposed to throw difficulties in the way. Still it has occurred to me that a proper construction of the rule would exclude the unanimous consent authorizing it.

The PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I object for the reasons stated by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] and because there will be no end to the thing. There are the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGH,] the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] and others, who will come day after day and ask to record their votes for and against the measure. Suppose it had passed by one majority, according to this process the whole thing would be reversed the next day. The Senator from California [Mr. WELLER] reminds me that he lost a vote on Thursday night which would have changed the result, one of much importance. This shows the necessity of adhering to the rule. It is with great respect to the two Senators that I object.

Mr. EVERETT and Mr. CLAYTON. I waive the request.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. FOOT. I rise to ask to be discharged from further service upon the Committee on Pensions. By the favor of the Senate and of the Presiding Officer, I have been placed upon four committees of this body, three of its standing committees and one special committee. I have made it a point of duty and obligation to attend all the meetings of all the committees upon which I have been placed, both the regular meetings and special meetings, and to perform, according to my best abilities, whatever duty or labor has been assigned to me by those committees.

I find my hands more than full of business from these several committees. I therefore move to be discharged from further service upon the Committee on Pensions, knowing that the business of the committee will not suffer from my absence, and that the committee can be filled by appointment from gentlemen who have taken their seats in this body since the organization of the standing committees.

The motion to excuse the Senator was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, the Senate did me the honor, at the commencement of the session, to appoint me a member of the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office. I have reluctantly served on that committee until now. Before I came to the Senate of the United States I had been very extensively engaged in the practice of law in connection with patents, and I have found, as I anticipated, that in the proceedings of the Committee on Patents I am continually encountering the cases of persons who have interests relating to patents with which I have heretofore been connected. I am willing to serve the Senate in any other capacity which they shall assign to me. I therefore ask the Senate to relieve me from further service on that committee, and that my place may be filled by some other gentleman; and they may, if they see fit, assign me to some other place.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. ADAMS, it was Ordered, That the President pro tempore fill the vacancies in the Committees on Pensions and Patents.

And Mr. FESSENDEN was appointed to the Committee on Patents, and Mr. SEWARD to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of J. Burrows Hyde, praying that the patent laws may be so amended as to make the fees chargeable for a patent the same to inventors from all foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a resolution of the Legislature of Maine, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of that State to oppose the passage of the Nebraska bill so long as it shall contain any provision repealing, abrogating, rescinding, or in any way invalidating the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. MORTON presented a petition of lieutenants in the United States revenue marine service, who were attached to the United States naval squadron in the West Indies during the Florida war in 1836, 1837, 1838, and 1839, praying to be allowed the same compensation as officers of like grade in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PETTIT presented the memorial of the Mayor and Common Council of the city of Evansville and State of Indiana, in reference to the site for the location of a western armory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. As the Nebraska bill, should it ever pass the House, may be returned to this body with amendments, which may again present this question for consideration, I ask the acceptance of these memorials, and that they may lie on the table:

A petition of citizens of Indiana, remonstrating against the passage of any bill for the organization of the Territory of Nebraska without a prohibition of slavery therein.

Also, a petition of citizens of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of any bill for the organization of the Territory of Nebraska which will permit slavery in the territory from which it was excluded by the Missouri compromise.

Also, a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any infringement of the Missouri compromise.

Also, a petition of the legal voters of Marlborough, Massachusetts, praying Congress to preserve inviolate the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to, and the petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WELLER presented the memorial of Douglas Ottinger, a captain in the United States revenue marine, praying compensation for an invention for saving life and property from shipwrecked vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEWARD presented resolutions passed at a meeting of the people of Sing Sing, New York, held on the 27th of February, 1854, opposed to the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, the petition of H. N. Holt and his family, remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a memorial of 62 citizens of the county of Orleans, in the State of New York, in favor of Congress granting aid to the construction of the Niagara ship canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a petition of citizens of Tonawanda, New York, praying Congress not to pass the Nebraska bill in its present form, nor in any way impair the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented a memorial of citizens of Iowa, praying that a grant of land may be made to aid in the construction of the Iowa Central Air-Line railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SLIDELL presented the memorial of Sarah D. Brigham, praying permission to locate land within the limits of the Bastrop claim; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the proceedings of a meeting of the Freeman's Association, held at Ossian, Iowa, opposed to the extension of slavery into Nebraska; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of any bill which will permit slavery in Nebraska, or otherwise infringe the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FISH presented the petition of Jane Beccannon, widow of Philip Beccannon, praying for a pension on account of his services during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, documents in support of the claim of Ormon Randall to pay and bounty land for services in the last war with Great Britain; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a petition of the Chancellor and Faculty of the University of the city of New York, praying a grant of a township of land to each chartered college or university in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of J. H. Taliaferro and others, sureties of D. F. M. Thornton, a purser in the Navy, praying to be released from their liability; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CASS presented three petitions of citizens of New York, praying that measures may be taken to secure religious liberty to American citizens while resident abroad; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, a petition of citizens of Monroe, Michigan, praying that measures may be taken to secure religious liberty to American citizens while in foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. SEBASTIAN, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the memorial and papers of Henry C. Miller, Philip W. Thompson, and Jesse B. Turley, for the purpose of referring them to the proper Department.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, to whom was referred the petition of Peter A. Myers, praying an increase of pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, to authorize the Commissioner of Pensions to increase invalid pensions in certain cases; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the memorial of the Fox and Wisconsin Improvement Company, praying an additional grant of land, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, to authorize the State of Wisconsin to select the residue of the lands to which she is entitled, under the act of the 8th of August, 1846, for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHASE, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of Gideon Hotchkiss, praying the extension of a patent for improvements in reacting water-wheels and their appendages, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following petitions, submitted an adverse report on them collectively; which was ordered to be printed:

Petition of John F. Webb;
Petition of Robert Steele; and Petition of Lucretia W. Hubbard.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following petitions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

Petition of Jerathmiel Doty; and Petition of David Felker.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. PETTIT asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill to confirm the claim of Dusan de la Croix to a tract of land therein described; which was read a first and second time by its title, and, together with the petition and papers relating to the bill, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ADDITIONAL POST ROADS.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of creating, by law, the following post roads, to wit: from Jacksonport, on the east side of White river, to Pocahontas; also, from Rockport, via Robert Gray's and Abner H. Henson's, to Montroy, in Dallas county, all in Arkansas; also, from Washburn's Prairie, in Barry county, Missouri, via M. D. Tilford's, to Huntsville, in Arkansas, and report by bill or otherwise.

TRANSPORTATION OF MAILS.

Mr. RUSK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to the Senate what amount has been paid annually to the several railroads in the United States for the transportation of mails for the last three years up to the 1st of January last, with the rates of charges on the different roads.

GLENWOOD CEMETERY.

Mr. NORRIS. I am instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to report back the bill to incorporate the proprietors of the Washington Cemetery, with two amendments. I hope the bill will be taken up at the present time. It is in the usual form, and I think there can be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment was to strike out of the first section the words "Washington Cemetery Company," and insert "proprietors of the Glenwood Cemetery in the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following additional section:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall provide for the return, from time to time, to the Corporation of Washington, of reports of all interments made in said cemetery, of persons who have died within the limits of the said Corporation of Washington, in such manner and according to such forms as may be prescribed, from time to time, by the Corporation of Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed; and its title was amended by striking out the word "Washington" and inserting "Glenwood."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a bill to grant a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of the public land to actual settlers.

Also, a joint resolution for settling the accounts of A. Boyd Hamilton.

REMISSION OF DUTIES ON RAILROAD IRON.

Mr. DAWSON. I am directed by the committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the West Feliciana Railroad Company, and the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company, to submit a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief.

The bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. DAWSON. I ask the Senate to be kind enough to consider the bill now. It has already been passed by this body three or four times, and I do not think there can be any objection to it. As I shall be compelled to leave the city in the course of a day or two, and may not be back again for two or three weeks, I ask the Senate as a favor to me to take up the bill now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the West Feliciana Railroad Company the amount paid by them on judgments obtained against them by suits instituted for duties on the bonds given by them for the importation of certain bars of railroad iron, imported at New Orleans and New York, in the month of July, 1836; provided, it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the bars have been permanently laid down upon the railroad, except such part as may be proved to have been lost by the sinking of the steamboat Choctaw, in attempting to transport the same from New Orleans to Bayou Sara; and also, to refund the duties collected on railroad iron imported by the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company, at or about the time when the rails of the Red River Company, and the Central Railroad and Banking Company of Georgia, and the Monroe Railroad Company were imported, upon which Congress had remitted the duties.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it seems to me that one amendment ought to be made to this bill. I never heard of it until the moment when it was read; and it struck me, from hearing it read, that the portion of it which provides that the duties should not be paid on so much of the iron as was lost by the sinking of a steamboat should be stricken out. I do not see on what principle the Government is to be made the insurer of losses of railroad companies or of individuals in the importation of goods. It seems to me that that part of the bill requires amendment; and therefore I move to strike out the words "except such part thereof as may be proved to the satisfaction of said Secretary to have been lost by the sinking of the steamboat Choctaw, in an attempt to transport the same from New Orleans to Bayou Sara." The parties either insured or did not insure. If they did not insure, it was their own neglect; and they have no right to make the Government an insurer on their risks.

Mr. DAWSON. I cannot say that I understand the Senator's objection, because I did not hear him perfectly.

Mr. BAYARD. I stated that my objection to that portion of the bill was, that it exempted from duty a portion of the goods which were lost in consequence of non-insurance, if they were lost at all; and I cannot see the principle on which the Government of the United States, in cases where goods of any kind have been imported, should act as insurers, or suspend the collection of duties, founded on the want of insurance on the part of the party importing.

Mr. DAWSON. I will state to the Senator, that the clause to which he objects is in relation to iron imported by the West Feliciana Railroad Company. It is immaterial whether the iron was lost or not. It was imported at a time when railroad iron was free from duty, provided the conditions of the law were complied with. But on account of the iron being lost, those conditions could not be fulfilled. This, therefore, is an additional argument why Congress should allow the remission of the duties.

Mr. BAYARD. The explanation will be quite sufficient if the Senator can satisfy me that the Government would have been entitled to no duties on the iron at the time of importation.

Mr. DAWSON. That is the only point in the case, and it is the one which the Secretary of the Treasury is to investigate. This is a bill which was reported by the late Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MILLER,] from the Committee on Finance, three or four times; and it always passed the Senate without any serious objection. This is the same bill which has passed heretofore.

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot see how there is any discretion allowed to the Secretary on the subject by this bill. I admit that if the iron, at the time of its importation, was not subject to duty, this bill is all proper, and my amendment ought to be withdrawn. But if the iron was subject to duty, I cannot see the propriety of retaining that portion of the bill to which I object. If the clause left it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to determine that fact, it would be another matter; but I do not so read it.

Mr. BROWN. I think I can explain this matter to the satisfaction of my friend from Delaware in a few moments. The case comes up from my own State; and, as I understand it, it is this: Under a former act of Congress, railroad companies were allowed to bring in railroad iron free of duty, provided they laid it down on their railroads within a given time. This company did not undertake to pay duties at New Orleans, the port at which the iron was entered, because they calculated that they would certainly lay it down within the time prescribed by law, which they would have done, but for the loss of the iron in its transit from New Orleans to Bayou Sara—the place of landing for the road. The loss of the iron on the steamer Choctaw made it necessary for them to import a second lot of iron, which they laid down upon the road, but not within the time prescribed by law. They executed a bond to the Government for the duties on the first lot of iron; but the time having elapsed, the collector at New Orleans insisted on payment, and the parties, rather than be annoyed about the matter, paid the amount, but appealed to Congress to have it refunded. That is all there is of the case. But for the loss of the steamer, the first lot of iron would have been laid down within the time prescribed by law, and no duties would have been required. The insurance of the iron did not cover the duties, because the company never expected to be called upon to pay them, and of course they did not want to pay insurance upon a larger sum of money than was involved.

Mr. BAYARD. With the explanation of the Senator from Mississippi, I would cheerfully abandon the amendment which I have proposed, if it did not seem to me to be inconsistent with the apparent facts as stated in the bill. There could have been no recovery for the duties, if the iron was entitled to come in duty free.

Mr. BROWN. But it was not entitled to come in duty free, unless it was laid upon the road in a given time. It could not be so laid, because the iron was lost.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator will allow me to get through. He will see what my meaning is. This bill provides for an exemption from duties upon certain railroad iron which was lost. The iron which was lost, was iron on which, according to the allegation, there was no duty required. But there was a subsequent importation, which was not lost, and which was subject to duty under the existing laws, not having been laid down within the given time. This bill, however, applies to railroad iron which was lost. If that iron which was lost was not subject to duty, what would be the necessity of asking to have the duty refunded? If it was subject to duty at the time of its importation, and the loss afterwards attached to it, the ground of exception taken by the Senator from Mississippi falls; because the parties ought to have been insured against the duties to which they were liable, just as much as in any other case.

Mr. BROWN. I thought I had explained, that unless the iron was laid down within a given time, it was, according to law, to be subject to duty.

Mr. DAWSON. That was the condition of things.

Mr. BROWN. It was not so laid within the time required, because it was lost. If it had been laid on the road within the time prescribed, the bond which the company gave for the duty would have been canceled, and they would not have been required to pay the amount. The failure to lay down the iron within the time made the bond obligatory. It would have been laid down in time but for the loss of the steamer. The parties, as I remarked before, did not cover the whole by insurance, because they never expected to be compelled to pay the duty, and they did not want to pay insurance on a larger sum than the iron was worth. They did not wish to pay insurance upon the duty on the iron, which was, I believe, twenty-five dollars per ton, or perhaps a larger sum at that time.

Mr. BAYARD. I am satisfied with the explanation; I think the amendment ought not to be made, and therefore I withdraw it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I wish to call upon the Senator from Georgia to explain the principle upon which this bill rested, and especially to inform the Senate how many like bills may be behind it. I suppose that perhaps it might be considered on the other side as a subject connected in some indirect manner with grants of alternate sections of the public lands for railroad purposes. I know that Senator has devoted his mind very much to that subject, and generally and almost invariably acts upon principle in all matters of that kind, and, as he thinks, upon correct principle. I wish him, therefore, to inform the Senate of the exact principle upon which this bill rests, and how much money we are giving to these railroad companies.

Mr. DAWSON. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. FOOT. I would inquire whether it is in order to discuss the question on a bill after it has passed?

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order.

Mr. FOOT. Then I desire the floor for the purpose of asking the Senate to take up another bill.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope the Senator will allow me a moment to answer the Senator from Iowa. The same question was propounded to me three years ago, when this bill was under consideration; and I have before me the debate which then occurred between the Senator from Iowa and myself in regard to it. I stated to him then that these were the only two companies coming within the principle, and that they had been applying for twelve years. On this state of facts he answered, "I am satisfied; let the bill pass."

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. My friend from Georgia will oblige me by stating the principles of this bill, and the facts upon which he rests those principles.

Mr. DAWSON. I am obliged to my friend. I will do so, and more at length in my remarks when published.

The Georgia Railroad Company was chartered and commenced in 1835, when railroad iron was exempt from duty, and when the policy of the Government had been strongly expressed by returning all the duties paid on such iron. Having commenced, it was under the moral necessity of completing. The company was crippled by the revulsion of 1837 and 1840, but moved on as best it could. The iron was not needed until 1843, and was ordered in that year, but none of it arrived till after the 3d of March.

The company had graded the road, however, and made every preparation for the rails, and was obliged to import the rails, as they could not be made in this country at that time. There were other companies slowly progressing, with the one I am advocating; they, too, very seriously felt the revulsion I have just referred to. In this list I would name the Central Georgia Railroad Company, the Red River Railroad Company, Monroe Railroad Company, and the West Feliciana Railroad Company. Being all embarrassed by the times, and not being able to comply with the provisions of the act of 1832, they all applied to Congress for relief. Among the embarrassed companies was the West Feliciana railroad. That company presented its memorial for relief. The Georgia Railroad Company also presented a petition, which was referred to the Committee on Finance in 1844—mark, as early as 1844!

By pressing this subject further, it is seen that a bill was reported by that committee, which will be found in the bill-book of the Senate of the Twenty-Ninth Congress, (S. 184,) entitled "An act to remit duties which have accrued or been paid upon the importation of railroad iron in certain cases." That bill returns the duties upon all rails within three years after they have been imported for any road which was surveyed and established prior to the 30th of August, 1843. This bill was passed by the Senate, and was sent to the House, but was not acted upon. Immediately thereafter, the several companies made individual application for relief, and from time to time they have been relieved. The West Feliciana and Georgia railroad, among the first to start in their works of improvement, remain yet to be acted upon.

I have been thus particular in my statement in relation to the claims of the Georgia company, that it may be seen that it has been acted upon before, and that if the bill had been passed by the House, it would long since have had its duties returned. It is also worthy of observation here, that the Senate did not refer to the time when the iron came in, but when the railroad was surveyed and commenced, which is the true criterion. The act of 1832, it will be perceived, does not, under its provisions, refer to when the rails were imported, but when they were permanently laid down for use. The moment the work was commenced, the Government—during the act of 1832—stood pledged to return the duties for every road began under its provisions. The main reason for commencing the enterprise grew out of the inducement held out by Congress to companies that their rails, when laid down permanently for use, should be freed from duties.

The company says, and with propriety, "that when they projected and commenced their improvement, they had no reason to apprehend a change of policy, a policy manifested not only by exempting rails from duty, but by refunding large sums already paid by those who had no reason to expect such a bounty by previous encouragement."

Such were the provisions of the act of 1832, under which the Georgia Railroad Company were invited by the Government to embark in making their road.

The attempt to draw a distinction between the Georgia Railroad Company and the Feliciana company, if we wish our laws to rest upon equal and exact justice, cannot be sustained.

They both entered together in their respective enterprises; both were invited to do so by the promises of Congress, and they both laid down their rails at the same time. It is alleged, however, that the Feliciana company imported their iron first, but it is not pretended they wanted it first. It was just as necessary to the one as the other road that the rails should be imported.

The act of Congress of 1832, under which these companies started, did not consider the importation important. All that the Government was concerned about, was that the rails should be permanently laid down for use; and when a certificate of that fact was made out to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, the duties were to be returned. Indeed it may well be questioned whether the law under which the duties were claimed could in justice be made to apply to roads in progress, as Congress impliedly stood pledged to all who embarked under the act of 1832 to protect them by its provisions till completed. Its repeal could only operate upon new companies commenced after its repeal.

The company further represents "that the only principle necessary to their relief has already been recognized by Congress, the rigid requisitions of the act having been relaxed in favor of companies which had imported, but failed to lay down their iron before March of 1843. In principle a trifling difference in the time of importation can make no difference, when the necessity for the importation had been created previously to the passage of the act. As the article could not be obtained of American manufacture, it was purely a question of revenue, and the legal right to revenue had accrued as clearly in the one case as in the other; and the claims to the indulgence of the Government are in both cases equally strong.

Upon a full review of the facts in this case, it is seen that this company was greatly embarrassed by the revulsion of 1837 to 1840, but that they nevertheless went on with their crippled means, which prevented them from importing by a few months, and laying down the rails within the limit said to be required by the new law. Perhaps, however, it may not be out of the way to show, before I conclude, that the first act passed to suspend the provisions of the act of 1832 was enacted for the benefit of a Pennsylvania company, and seemed to have gone through without any difficulty. This was passed the very day that the act imposing duty on railroad iron was to go into effect—March 3, 1843. It runs thus:

"An act for the relief of Thomas Weaver and Jacob Hyrbarger, securities of the Norristown and Valley Railroad Company.

"Be it enacted, That the time for actually and permanently laying upon any said road iron imported into the port of Philadelphia by the Norristown and Valley Railroad Company to entitle the same to a drawback of duties, is hereby extended for one year, &c. And if, during the said term of one year, the securities prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that the whole or any part of the said railroad iron has been actually and permanently laid upon any railroad of the United States, then he is to order and direct the whole, or a proportionate part of the judgment to be marked satisfied, upon the defendant's paying cost."

It will be seen that the rails had probably been disposed of, and yet they give the sureties a year to satisfy the Secretary of the Treasury that the rails were laid down for permanent use. All that the Government insisted upon was proof that the rails had been laid down and used as rails upon a railroad, and had not been used for any other purpose; for, if used for any other purpose, the rails would be liable to duties. This, as I have stated, was the first relief act, and was for Pennsylvania; and since that time other sections of the Union have been asking for relief, where the works had been commenced under the invitation and promises of the act of 1832; and the very fact of Congress giving one year from 1843 (making it March, 1844,) to the sureties referred to, proves legislatively that it was never intended to apply the law to roads commenced. And as the two Houses have been thus liberal to a company of Pennsylvania, it is but just that Georgia, Mississippi, and other States should be treated with like kindness.

It will require more logic than I am master of to go home to my constituents and try to satisfy them that the Georgia company, that commenced with the Central Georgia and Red River and Monroe Railroad Companies, and the West Feliciana Company, are not entitled to a return of duties on their rails, while all the other companies just named are.

Because one company, forsooth, sent for their rails a few months in advance of the other, that one is to have their rails duty free, and that, too, when both had started together, under the promises of the act of 1832, and under a full promise of the duty being returned. The two companies in this bill are alike as two peas; indeed they may be justly said to resemble the Siamese twins, both brought into existence under the same act, both applicants for relief occasioned by the same misfortunes. To separate them would be as unjust as to cut the ligament that has bound the Siamese twins together from the day of their birth up to the present hour. They must stand or fall together.

I conclude here by quoting the report of the Committee on Finance in relation to the West Feliciana Railroad Company, as wholly applicable to the case of the Georgia company, that I am asking justice for. The report is as follows:

"Under the circumstances, the committee finding that the company has acted in good faith, that all the iron has been scrupulously and faithfully applied as designed by the law of 1832, think this case clearly falls within the spirit of the act just referred to; that the delay in laying down the iron was not voluntary, nor in any manner the result of negligence on their part, but from obstacles which they could not control."

This is a just description of the circumstances of the Georgia company. Nor is anything required, unless the Secretary of the Treasury should be satisfied that the rails were laid down as represented in the section added to this bill.

By the provisions of the act of 1843, for the relief of the sureties of the Norristown and Valley Railroad Company, the parties were allowed till the year 1844 to lay down the rails of said company. Now, during the years 1843 and 1844 the rails of the Georgia company were also laid down. So that, upon this principle, if no other could be advanced, the Georgia company are entitled to all the privileges extended to the Norristown and Valley company. But since that time Congress has remitted the duties to the companies that began their roads at the same time the Georgia did. Again, if the duties be returned to companies that commenced their works with the Georgia company, and under the same promises from the act of 1832, does not Congress give a high premium to one, while it imposes a duty on the other, in utter disregard of the act of 1832, which notified them, when they began their work, that they should not pay any duties on their rails if they certified to the Secretary of the Treasury that they had actually laid down their rails for use. It hardly seems necessary to discuss this subject at any greater length. For it cannot be possible that Congress will invite different parties to embark in a great enterprise, and when they are about to complete their undertakings, that they will select a number of the companies and return to them their duties, and compel the others to pay them. Such flagrant injustice can never receive the sanction of our National Legislature. I leave the subject with the Senate, not doubting that it will extend its justice to all the companies that began under the inviting promises of the act of 1832.

The bill was then passed unanimously.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FOOT. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of the bill making a grant of lands to the several States of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons. The bill has been read a third time, and the question is upon its passage, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for the present, for I am desirous that the Senate should take up, during the morning hour this morning, the bill to provide for the extension and completion of the Treasury building, and for the construction of a building for the War, Navy, and Interior Departments. It is so essential that the bill to which I refer, if it is to be passed at all, should be passed at once, that I hope the Senator will yield. I do not think it will provoke debate, and it is important that it should be passed early. If it occasions debate, I will suffer it to be postponed.

Mr. FOOT. The Senator is aware that the bill for the consideration of which I call now stands on the question of its passage, and on that question the yeas and nays were ordered several days ago. I am willing, however, under the circumstances, to give way to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I ask the Senate now to take up the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. WALKER. I do not wish to object to the consideration of that bill; but it will probably give rise to debate.

Mr. BAYARD. I think not. If it does, I will consent that it may be postponed.

Mr. WALKER. I ask the Senator to waive his motion for the present, in order to allow the homestead bill, which has been received from the House of Representatives, to be read twice, and referred.

THE HOMESTEAD BILL.

The bill from the House of Representatives, to grant a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands to actual settlers, was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. WALKER. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CASS. Before this bill is referred, I desire to express my full concurrence in the great measure it proposes, and my hope that the Committee on Public Lands will report upon it speedily and favorably, and that it will pass the Senate with as little delay as possible. The time has arrived when the public domain has ceased to be necessary as a source of revenue, and we are now enabled to offer one of the noblest tributes to the value of free institutions which the world has seen by furnishing the first example of an equal and safe system, by which every citizen may become a land owner, and by which a Government exhibits itself in the character, not of a tax collector, its old and established attribute, but of a medium on the part of the people of giving to all who desire it homes, permanent homes, for themselves and their families. It is a new and noble function in the operations of government, this power of distribution without the necessity to exercise taxation, this granting to each a part of what belongs to all, this attention to the wants and wishes of a vast portion of the country; and the measure itself, as well as the feeling it manifests, will do more to strengthen the cause of free government through the world than any event in our day.

Twice has this measure passed the House of Representatives, who, from their immediate relation to their constituents, may well be supposed to express their sentiments, and I trust the Senate will not now withhold its cordial coöperation; and, for one, I desire to return my acknowledgments to the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JOHN L. DAWSON,] whose earnest and able devotion to this bill conducted so much to its passage through the House. He deserves the gratitude of every friend of this great measure.

I can conceive nothing in the progress of human society better calculated to add to the strength, the resources, and the moral power of this country, than this plan of justice and policy. In times of danger it will give us a physical force ready for any emergency, and at the same time a happy, contented population, adding by its industry to the wealth of the nation, and bound, no less by gratitude than by patriotism, to a Government thus proving by its deeds its desire to promote the happiness of all.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise, Mr. President, merely for the purpose of calling the particular attention of the Senate to a declaration which has been made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan. It is a declaration in which I most heartily concur, and which I rejoice to hear on this floor from such a quarter. It is a declaration, the clear, practical good sense of which will, I trust, impress it upon this body, as the standing of the distinguished gentleman who made it will impress it upon the minds of the people of the country: I refer to the declaration, that the time has come when the Government should look no longer to the public lands as a source of revenue. It is to those words, emphatically, that I wish to call the attention of the Senate. I know that in our own western States, where we have felt the burdens of the system of land ownership by the General Government, those words will be hailed proudly, and we shall be happy to see them carried into effect by the Senate and House of Representatives, and become the law of the land.

Sir, there is not a new State which has not labored under great disadvantages in consequence of the burden of the system of ownership by the General Government. It has always been the policy of every independent State in the world, by its legislation, to endeavor to keep within its limits all the circulating medium which its people, by their industry and exportations, may acquire. But the effect of this system of ownership is to draw away the means of the people of the new States. The State which I have the honor to represent here, small as she is in point of population—having now only about two hundred and ten thousand people within her borders, according to the last census—has paid into the Treasury of the United States millions of dollars. The same is true in reference to the other land States. When a man comes to settle among us, he is compelled to pay his money into the Treasury in order to get a spot on which to live; and the money which is thus paid by the settlers is carried out of the State and expended everywhere else. There is no industrious man in the State who makes anything to export but is compelled to pay this Government for land to cultivate. Thus it is that our means are paid over to the land offices, and the money which we contribute leaves our State, and is expended in the vast and various schemes which are got up for the protection of your commerce, and the advancement of your local interests along the sea-board.

These are facts which cannot be denied, though gentlemen who wish to receive revenue from the public lands will hardly be willing to acknowledge them. I have stated the burdens, oppressions, and, I may say, tyrannies under which we have suffered for years, yet we have never protested against them. But the declaration made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan this morning, comes with peculiar pleasure to us, who have labored so long under a crying exhaustion of this description, which has been forced upon us by the peculiar policy of the Government of the United States, the owner of our soil. I rose simply for the purpose of calling attention to that declaration, so that it may attract our consideration at once, and may attract the consideration of the country.

Sir, the people of the new States have contributed more, in proportion to their population, to the support of this Government, than any other people in the United States. This is eminently so of my own State. If you go to the Land Office and examine your public records, you will find that that State, small as its population, has paid millions of dollars into the public Treasury. In return for this, how much have you expended for her? Why, sir, if we come here and ask for a small appropriation of public lands for any specific object within the limits of our State, a great outcry is raised, and we are regarded as plunderers. The means which those who come into our State bring with them is taken from us, and thus we are impoverished; and when we incur a State debt which we happen to be unable to pay, we are reproached by those who have impoverished us. They forget that it was occasioned by their legislation, and that we are willing to tax ourselves to meet our obligations.

Sir, I hope that every man from the new States will unite and struggle together, until the day shall cease when this Government shall make the public lands a source of national revenue, and thus tax us longer, and that they will mark those who wish to retain such a source of revenue.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] before this bill is referred. The Committee on Public Lands have had a precisely similar bill before them for the last three months, and they have not yet reported it back to the Senate. I want to know, therefore, whether this bill is going there to be buried? If so, I prefer that it should remain on the President's table, so that we may call it up and consider it at any time. If it will be reported back, I have no objection to its going to the committee. If, however, it is to remain, as the bill which was referred to that committee three months ago has remained up to the present time, I prefer that it should not be referred, but should be kept here under our own control.

Mr. WALKER. That is a most unjust charge against the committee. The committee reported some time since the bill which they agreed upon.

Mr. GWIN. The homestead bill?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir, the homestead bill?

Mr. GWIN. Then I ask pardon; for I was not aware of it.

Mr. WALKER. The pardon is granted.

Mr. GWIN. Why, then, should the bill go to the committee?

Mr. WALKER. I have moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands for consideration in that committee. This bill has passed the House of Representatives; it has not yet passed the Senate. I propose that we shall take this bill into consideration. If we agree upon this, we can consider it in place of the bill which we have reported. Sir, some years ago I pressed upon the Senate the propriety of this measure, but I then got nothing but sneers for my pains. Sir, perhaps it is more gratifying to my heart this morning than to any other man in America, to hear men as distinguished as the Senator from Michigan, and the Senator from Arkansas, rise in their places, and almost with avidity claim the privilege at the first moment when they have an opportunity of doing so, of adding their great weight in favor of this policy. I rejoice at it. I hail it as one of the best omens for our country which I have seen for a long time. I hope the bill will be committed; and I now give my assurance to the Senator from California that it shall come back from the committee very speedily.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Mr. President, I suppose that upon the parliamentary rule, which requires a bantling to be sent to fathers friendly to it, this measure may safely be committed to the Committee on Public Lands. I presume that nobody who has ever looked at the catalogue of members constituting that committee need waste time here in debating a proposition as to whether they will report back or vote for the homestead bill. I thank my friend from Michigan for his speech this morning, and I can say to him and to my friend from California, that the committee meets to-morrow morning, and that I believe a majority of them will agree to report it back to-morrow with any amendments which they may think necessary to be made, if they think it proper to adopt any. For myself, I think we had better make no amendments, but pass the bill as it is.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, the friends of this bill are those who have arrested its progress to the committee, so far as the debate has that effect; they must excuse me, therefore, for mingling in it by the expression of a very few words. Sir, when the honorable Senator from Michigan says the day has come when this Government should cease to derive revenue from its public lands, I should expect the honorable Senator to connect with it the expression of opinion that the day has arrived when this Government should cease to become the purchaser of public lands, for I can hardly suppose that it would be part of the policy of the Senator from Michigan to expend the public treasure in the purchase of public lands in order to give them away to any who will come and take them.

But, sir, I have been impressed with the remarks which fell from the Senator from Arkansas. It may be, and doubtless is, that these new States, where there is a large body of public lands, are repressed both in their population and their resources by the Federal Government being a large landholder. It may be that it would be wise on the part of the Government to modify its former policy in relation to the public lands under which they were treated as a subject of revenue only; but I trust the time has not yet come when this Government is to be the recipient of property purchased by the whole Union in order to distribute it as a largess throughout the Union, far less that the Government shall hold up the public domain, as I understand this bill proposes to do, to individuals who may come here from every quarter, totally unconnected with our institutions, and become the owners of it. I cannot imagine upon what foundation any policy could rest which would leave this Government, from year to year, to purchase, with millions and tens of millions of dollars, large domains of public lands, in order that it may then give them away to those who come here to take them. I see the time has arrived when, from the condition of our country, it may be necessary to modify the policy in relation to the public land; but I would not modify it by purchasing it to give away. I have not matured any views on the subject, but it is more than probable that when this bill comes up for consideration I shall offer some substitute for it, which shall take away, or mitigate at least to a large extent, the evils complained of by the new States; and not take the money for the public domain to be given as a largess; a policy that I would deprecate as the most injurious and demoralizing this Government could embark in.

Mr. BROWN. I am desirous, at this point in the debate, to mention a fact, which I trust will attract the attention of the Senate, and that it may not wholly escape the notice of the country. Some weeks ago I introduced a proposition in reference to the subject of homesteads, and had it referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The committee considered it along with other propositions, and reported it back with some modifications, not materially altering or changing the object which I had in view in drawing up the bill. I will mention the principles embodied in that bill, that Senators may look to it, and be prepared to give some consideration to it when it shall come up in its order.

The proposition which I introduced, and which has already received the favorable consideration of the Senate committee, does not propose, at any time, to give the absolute title in the land to the settler, but to give him the right of occupancy; not as at present ordered by law, for twelve months, but for an unlimited period of time; giving him the right to remain until he conceives himself prepared and ready to pay for it, allowing him the privilege at all times to pay the $1 25 which the Government demands, if that remain the minimum; but never passing to him the title until he does pay it; and also refusing to take that price, or any other price, from any other purchaser.

In case the occupant dies, leaving a wife, his rights survive to his widow, under the proposition which I introduce; and if the husband and wife both die, leaving infant children, it is then provided that the land may be sold for the benefit of the children, and the fee at that time passes to the children. What I expect to gain by this proposition is, that the settler shall be guaranteed in that which you propose to give him—a home—from which he could not be turned by the General Government or by any other agency, not even by his own want of good management. You give him a home, and guarantee to him the possession of it against yourself and all the world, and even against his own improvidence. I had no doubt, in drafting the bill, that the effect of it would ultimately be to bring a larger amount of money from the sales of public lands into the Treasury of the United States than you derive now. Having been raised and lived all my life in a land State, and having seen the effects of this system on settlers, I am prepared to say, from absolute observation, that what the settler wants, most of all things, is quiet, repose, and security in his new home. When you give him all this, you give full scope and verge to his energy, mental and physical. Without this he is crippled in mind and body, and wholly incapable of effecting any good or valuable purpose. If you will give him this, the time cannot be distant when he will be prepared to pay you the price you demand for the land; and then, for the sake of owning it, he will step in and pay for it.

I do not intend this morning, in this irregular way, to discuss the principles of that bill fully; but I wish to impress it upon the minds of Senators, and that the country may take a note of it, that I have from the beginning resisted the principle of giving the land absolutely to the settler; because, in my opinion, it will defeat the great object you have in view. I know enough of this people to be able to say, from absolute observation, that at the end of five years, or very soon thereafter, when you propose to pass the title to the settler, he will be as landless as he is now. If you want a homestead bill, a law which shall secure the settler in the possession of his home, and give him peace, and quiet, and security there, give him the right of occupancy, secure him in that right; extend the protection of your law over him; there let him remain in peace and quiet until, in his own sober, discreet judgment, he is prepared to own the land. Do not thrust the ownership upon him at a time when, perhaps, he is unable to receive it, and when it can be of no benefit to him.

Another advantage I expect to derive from the adoption of the proposition which I introduced is this: It allows the settler to change his location as often as he pleases. If he makes a bad location, as those who go into the Territories very often do, and finds that he can better himself by removing to some other place, you allow him to remove. He has occupied the land, and has not damaged it. He surrenders it to the Government and goes to another place; and this he can do until he finds himself well located, in a condition where he can spend his labor profitably. Under the proposition which is now before us, if he makes a bad location, you make him abide by it. If he happens to settle upon bad lands, lands subject to overflow, such as will not yield in obedience to his labor, or such as are in a sickly neighborhood, or under other unfavorable circumstances, so that he cannot inhabit it with safety and profit to himself, it compels him either to abandon the whole or to remain there and incur all the risks and disadvantages of being in a place of that sort.

I trust that Senators will take up that proposition and examine it, because I give notice now that I do not mean to abandon it. I shall urge it before the Senate when this subject comes up for consideration. While I do not say I shall vote against the bill if the proposition of which I have spoken is not adopted, yet I greatly prefer the one reported by the committee, and shall insist upon its adoption. If the Senate vote it down, whether I shall vote for this bill or not, will remain for future consideration.

Mr. BAYARD. When I yielded the floor on the motion to take up bill No. 527, it was merely as a courtesy to permit this bill to be introduced and referred; but, like the principles of this bill, abusing the Constitution of the United States, that courtesy is abused. I do not mean now to enter into the discussion of this bill in an irregular manner, for it is entirely contrary to any rule or order that ought to prevail in a deliberative body. The bill is introduced for the purpose of reference, and here we have a full discussion upon its merits; and not only a discussion upon its merits, but the Senator from Arkansas appealed to the sectional feeling of the country upon it. Sir, I am opposed to sectional appeals, whether on the subject of slavery or of the public lands. The honorable Senator remarked that he hoped the people of the new States would put a mark upon the men who opposed the principles which he advocated. Be it so, Mr. President, although as to myself I cannot say that I have any higher aspirations than the honorable position which I occupy; yet, whether I had or not, no fear of any sentiment, or any opinion existing in any part of this country, or of any individual man, will ever make me yield to what I believe to be an unconstitutional principle. I will endeavor to consider this bill fairly and calmly. I hope, and I know, I shall be willing to do full justice to the western or land States. But I am very sure that if, in my view of the Constitution, they seek to take that which is common property of the Union, and assume a ground that we are now to give up our property, and cease to look to it as a source of revenue; if they do that in violation of the Constitution, no public opinion of the West, no public opinion or private censure here or elsewhere, will ever drive me from voting against the bill, and expressing my opinions upon the principles of justice which it violates. I do not say that it does violate these principles, for I have not examined the bill; but I speak of the enunciation of the sentiment which the honorable Senator has disclaimed, not as a personality, but in its effect calculated to deter a fair examination of the principles of the bill before it has actually been reported upon by a committee, or come before the Senate for proper discussion.

What view I may take of it when it comes up I cannot say. I will only state thus far, as at present advised. There is one section in the bill which I have seen, and one section which, with my present impressions, I believe, if it be not a violation of the letter of the Constitution, is beyond all question a violation of the intent, spirit, and purpose of the Federal Constitution. I will state the objection now, though it will be a subject of reflection and for retraction hereafter on my part, if I find it unfounded. The objection to which I allude is this: that that, or any other bill which attempts to establish the principle of the homestead on the ground of the alienability or inalienability of the lands within the States, whether it is done indirectly by means of retaining the title in the Government or not, is a violation of the Federal Constitution, inasmuch as it perverts the Federal power, in the disposition of the lands for the purpose of affecting what is a matter of municipal discretion alone, the subjecting of lands to the demands of a creditor.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to express the hope that this debate may stop here. A question prematurely discussed is badly discussed. I wish also to say, notwithstanding what has been said by friends and opponents of the bill, that I hope it will not be understood that this bill is favored alone by representatives of the new States. On the contrary, I am sure it will find other supporters and advocates. It will be very pleasant for me, as a friend of the bill, to speak and to vote for it now, as I have done more than once heretofore. It would be unkind and discourteous to withhold it from the consideration of the standing committee, since we know the sincerity and the zeal of this committee in the support of the principle of the homestead policy. Especially is it due that it should be submitted to the revision of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. WALKER], who is a member of that committee. I remember when that Senator introduced and proposed a homestead bill here, at times not long past, when the proposition won almost no favor here, and very little popularity anywhere. I congratulate that honorable Senator on the prospect of the speedy adoption of a policy identified with his character and his fame.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will not detain the Senate by discussing the bill at this time. I did not say in the beginning that it was supported only by delegates from western States. On the contrary, I know that some of its warmest and most ardent supporters are to be found in the old States. I rejoice that such is the case. I favor the bill myself. I shall favor it throughout, so long as it is kept within reasonable bounds. I do not wish to prolong the debate. I wish merely to say that the expression which I used in the former part of the debate was not intended to be personal, certainly not to the Senator from Delaware. Perhaps my phraseology was not sufficiently guarded. I trust, nevertheless, that we shall be permitted gratefully to recollect those gentlemen whose enlarged and liberal spirit prompts them so to legislate upon interests which are vital to us, that we shall no more be oppressed by the attempt to derive a revenue from the lands that lie within the limits of our State. I may urge upon all, though in doing so I may be guilty of iteration, that we are entitled to great consideration from this Government. The fact should be prominently presented that we have already paid into the public Treasury more than the public lands ever cost; nay, sir, we have paid millions into the public Treasury over and above all the expense of the original purchase and of the subsequent management of the public lands. And the Senator from Delaware should not forget the very striking fact that the General Government is still possessed of an immense domain, although it has derived from the public lands $60,000,000 more than the cost of the whole, including the expense of survey and sale.

Mr. PETTIT. I do not design to discuss this question at this time, though I shall at the proper time ask to be heard at length upon it. I rise simply to express my hope that the vote will be taken, and the bill referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I then shall propose to proceed to the consideration of the question of the right of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PHELPS] to his seat. That question has been delayed for the consideration of the Nebraska bill, and I shall ask to-day to have it taken up. I hope the vote will be taken on this question.

Mr. WALKER. Let the bill be read a second time.

Mr. CASS. I desire to say a word in reply to the Senator from Virginia. What I said was, that the time had arrived when the public lands were not necessary as a source of revenue. I never meant to convey the idea that you should buy lands for the purposes which the Senator has expressed. I merely said that the time has arrived when they ceased to be necessary as a source of revenue. Any man who goes back to the history of the country will know that the land was looked upon as a great source of revenue. That time has passed. Circumstances and events have changed. I merely want to put the honorable Senator right on that point.

The bill was then ordered to be read a second time; and it was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A. BOYD HAMILTON.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives, for settling the accounts of A. Boyd Hamilton, was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask that that joint resolution may be put on its passage. It simply proposes to take from the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House, and the Clerk of the Printing Committee, the adjudication and settlement of certain printing accounts and to confer the power upon the Comptroller of the Treasury. I presume there will be no objection to it.

Objection being made, the bill was passed over.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the Senate will now proceed with the consideration of the bill to authorize the extension and completion of the Treasury Building, and also the construction of a building for the War, Navy, and Interior Departments.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Delaware will assent to the postponement of this bill, that we may proceed to the consideration of the case of the gentleman who is here claiming a seat from Vermont.

Mr. BAYARD. If the bill should give rise to discussion I have intimated that I would give way to the consideration of the case of the Senator from Vermont. The bill was taken up under peculiar circumstances; but if there is anything in it which requires discussion, or if the honorable Senator from Indiana is opposed to it, and desires to discuss it, I, of course, will yield.

Mr. PETTIT. It is due to the honorable Senator from Vermont, and to the Senate alike, that the case of that Senator should be taken up and disposed of. It is a question of privilege. It only gave way under urgent necessity, as it seemed to me, on the demand of the friends of the Nebraska bill. Of all questions, it should be considered at an early day, and in all other deliberative bodies it would have had the precedence. It ought to have it here; and I hope other business will be made to give way for its consideration. The honorable gentleman who is interested in the case is present and is ready to proceed with his remarks. I hope, therefore, the bill proposed by the Senator from Delaware will be postponed.

Mr. MASON. I do not suppose there is any great urgency for taking up the case of the Senator from Vermont to-day. I should prefer that it should lie over until to-morrow. I desire to say something upon it which I am not now prepared to say.

Mr. PETTIT. The Senator from Virginia need not proceed to-day. The Senator from Vermont himself is ready to go on.

Mr. MASON. I understood that that Senator desired to close the debate. My object was not to interfere with him.

Mr. PETTIT. No, sir. On the contrary, he wishes to go on now.

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot see that there can be any objection to proceeding with the consideration of the bill at the present time. It is one which will give rise to no debate. If, in the judgment of the Senate, these buildings ought to be constructed, the bill should be passed at an early day. There is no doubt that it will take but very little time to pass it, if no opposition is made to it. It is not my desire to preclude the honorable Senator from Vermont from proceeding with the discussion in his own case. It is with no fault of mine that this bill has been delayed to so late an hour in the day. I yielded its consideration to have the other bill referred which has just been disposed of. It is a bill which relates to a question which is undoubtedly a matter of public interest; and if there is no objection made to it, I do not see why a motion should be made to postpone it.

Mr. PETTIT. The State of Vermont is either entitled to two votes or to one only. She has sent two men here; the seat and the right to vote of one is not contested—the other is. A delicacy on the part of that other forbids him to take any part in the general discussion of subjects before the Senate, or in any vote whatever; she is, therefore, disfranchised, and for her I claim the early consideration of this question. It is her right to be heard here if she has properly sent two Senators, and this, over all other questions, should be taken up for consideration.

Mr. BAYARD. I think that is perfectly correct; the only misfortune is that the honorable Senator could not recollect anything of all this when this discussion took place in the Senate on the subject of the mere reference of another bill.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on postponing the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I understand the Senator from Delaware to say, that if objection is made to the bill, or it leads to discussion, he will agree to let it go over. It can be determined, in a moment whether there is to be any such objection or discussion. I am most anxious to proceed with the case of the Senator from Vermont; but if this bill is not objected to, let us pass it, and then proceed to the consideration of that case. If it is to be objected to, or discussed, let us ascertain that fact, and then postpone it. I make this suggestion to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. PETTIT. I do not know what the bill is.

Mr. DODGE. Let us hear it read.

The PRESIDENT. It is a bill to authorize the extension and completion of the Treasury building; also the construction of a building for the War, and Navy, and Interior Departments.

Mr. PETTIT. I am very anxious to proceed to the consideration of the Vermont case. I may have objections to the bill, and I may have to discuss it. Under these circumstances, I should prefer that it should not be taken up.

The PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

Mr. ADAMS. I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that he desired to debate the bill. With that understanding I move that it be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD. Let it be read first; and then, if the Senator says he means to object, of course I shall agree to let it go over.

The bill was accordingly read.

It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to cause the Treasury Building to be completed, so as also to include and provide within it suitable rooms and accommodations for the State Department. The whole to constitute one building, with a front on Fifteenth street not exceeding four hundred and seventy feet, a front of similar extent facing west, a front not exceeding two hundred and seventy feet facing north, and a similar front facing south; but no alterations are to be made in the exterior of the present Treasury Building, except what may be required to unite it to the additions. The present line of columns on Fifteenth street are to be finished by constructing a recessed portico with a pediment at each end. The north and south fronts are each to have a portico in the center of eight columns in width, and the west front to have a projecting portico of eight columns, flanked by receding recessed porticos of two columns each, and to be finished at the ends by recessed porticos similar to those on Fifteenth street, the remaining portions of the exterior to be ornamented with ante similar to those of the present Treasury Building. There are to be two court yards for light and air, each of which is not to be less than one hundred and twenty by one hundred and forty feet. The architectural order of the present Treasury Building is to be preserved in the additions. The basement is to be faced with dressed granite, and the superstructure with marble; but the entire building is to be made thoroughly fire-proof. The details of the plan of the building are to be subject to the approval and direction of the President of the United States.

It proposes further to authorize the President to cause to be erected a building for the War and Navy and Interior Departments, at or near the sites of the present buildings, to conform in outside dimensions to the buildings authorized to be erected for the Treasury and State Departments, with such modifications in architectural details as the President may approve. The basements of the building to be faced with dressed granite or marble, and the superstructure with marble. And the sum of $600,000 is appropriated to commence their construction, which money may be applied to either or both of the buildings, which are to be erected consecutively or simultaneously, as the President may determine. If only one be constructed at a time, the building designed for the State and Treasury Departments is to be first completed.

Mr. PHELPS. I beg leave to make a remark, if the Senate will indulge me; and I am induced to do so by the remarks which have been made by other Senators. So far as I am concerned, I am certainly anxious that the question of my right to a seat here should be speedily determined. The Senate will recollect that I was interrupted in the remarks which I commenced on a previous occasion; and they will permit me to say that I do desire, as speedily as possible, to resume and conclude those remarks. But at this late period of the day, I do not expect that I shall be able to conclude by the time at which the Senate would desire to adjourn. Under these circumstances, permit me to suggest that the arrangement be made to postpone the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. STUART. In accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, I move that the further consideration of that subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. PETTIT. It is not before the Senate at present, and therefore cannot be postponed.

Mr. STUART. I desire to make it the order of the day for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. ADAMS. There is a bill under consideration that must be disposed of before any such motion can be made.

Mr. STUART. I suppose unanimous consent will be given to take it up for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT. The bill under consideration must be disposed of first.

Mr. ADAMS. I move to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

VERMONT SENATORSHIP.

Mr. FOOT. I now move that the resolution in relation to the case of my colleague be taken up, for the purpose of making it the special order of the day for to-morrow at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and its further consideration was postponed, and made the special order for, one o'clock to-morrow.

INDIGENT INSANE.

Mr. FOOT. I now renew the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill making a grant of lands to the several States of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons. I yielded the floor for the consideration of the other bill. I hope it will now be taken up and voted upon. I will merely remark that it stands upon the question of its passage, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. Before the vote is taken upon the passage of the bill, I desire to call attention to its provisions. Ten millions of acres of public lands are to be distributed among the States according to the ratio fixed by the bill. When a State has no lands, in the opinion of the Governor of that State, worth $1 25 an acre, its proportion may be located in any other of the States or Territories, on lands subject to private entry. Ten millions of acres are to be located, not by the States, according to the bill, but by the assignees of the States; or, in other words, by speculators, who may purchase from the States, at a sum not less than $1 25 an acre, the amount to which each is entitled under the bill. What is to be the effect? Your State, sir, and the States of Iowa, Illinois, and Arkansas, will then have in the hands of speculators ten millions of acres of the public land remaining unsold. We have been talking about giving settlers their homesteads. Pass this bill, and in those States—and those are the only States I know of where lands are desirable—you will have no homesteads. The lands will be kept at $5 to $10 an acre in the hands of speculators; for when they get all the good lands, they will hold them up until they get that amount for them. The homestead bill will not be worth a button if you pass this bill. No, sir. In your State, if there should be any lands left there worth $1 25 an acre, they will be taken.

Sir, I have no special interest in this matter. The State which I have the honor in part to represent has none, for we have not a quarter section of land in that State worth $1 25 an acre. Therefore, for the portion to which Mississippi is entitled, she must go over into Arkansas and take it there. As far as I personally and my constituents are concerned, I feel no interest in it; but if I resided in one of those States where the lands will be thus subject to speculators, I would importune every member of the Senate to send any other disaster, any other evil upon the country, rather than to place ten millions of acres of public lands in the hands of speculators, to be held and disposed of by the assignees of the different States. My State has no interest in the question; but I cannot consent, however benevolent the object may be, to impose such an evil on the States that have lands yet remaining unsold subject to private entry.

But this is not my only objection to the bill, though that is sufficient, for I would not impose upon any State an injury which I would be unwilling to impose upon my own. But, as has already been remarked by the Senator from Virginia, if the Federal Government can go into the different States, and there examine the condition of the poor, and provide by law for their relief, I should like to know where we are to stop? We all know, Mr. President, that this, as well as all other Governments, is disposed to exercise, not only the power conferred upon it, but to encroach upon the powers reserved to others. There is, in other words, a constant tendency towards the consolidation of power in the hands of this Federal Government. The facility with which it can step beyond the legitimate purposes of its creation, has a tendency to induce the exercise of powers not expressly given.

It is contended, I know, in regard to the public lands, that the Federal Government being a trustee, and having the right to dispose of them in such a way as to promote the best interests of the whole, you may dispose of the lands in this way, although you cannot collect the money and dispose of the proceeds. I must acknowledge that I cannot draw the distinction. The difference which there is between appropriating the lands by the Federal Government to the poor of the different States, and selling it by the officers of the Government, and then distributing the proceeds, is a distinction, in my mind, without a difference. I am not able to see it.

I before remarked, when I first objected to the bill, that this mode of disposing of the lands is much more objectionable than the other. It is a proposition to dispose of the public lands to provide for the poor; mark you, the provision of this bill is, that not a dollar is to be given to the erection of an asylum, not one dollar to be given to a person who is able to pay his own expenses, but it is for the indigent, who are unable to pay those expenses. It is, in a word, a provision out of the public Treasury for the poor of the different States and counties. Certainly the framers of our Constitution never contemplated that they were conferring such powers. These are unfortunate persons. My colleague [Mr. Brown] spoke correctly when he stated that every member of this body would take pleasure in voting for this bill, if he could do so consistently with his obligations to the country and his obligations to the Constitution. But, sir, however benevolent the object may be, it seems to me that we should look to the consequences. We should look to the power. These unfortunate individuals are the objects of the care, the anxiety, and the provision of the State, and not of the Federal Government. It is said, however, that we have been in the habit of making appropriations of public lands for soldiers, not as a compensation, but as a gratuity on account of the gratitude of the country. I have not so understood any appropriation that has ever been made. My understanding is, that in the estimation of Congress, the amount of compensation awarded to the soldiers of the late war, and of the Revolution, did not remunerate them for the services they had rendered to the country; and although tardy, when this bounty has been granted it has been as pay, and not as a gratuity. So in regard to the different States. It is said that we have been in the habit of appropriating these lands for schools and for colleges. That is true, but not as a gratuity. So far as I recollect, not a solitary appropriation of the public lands has ever been made, except to the States in which the lands lie; and for what? As a gratuity to provide for the education of the citizens of the different States? No, sir; but in consideration that those who went there to develop the resources of the country reclaimed lands which were valueless, made them valuable, and rendered a service to the country. For that consideration—that "good and valuable consideration"—the lands have been appropriated to the different States for colleges and schools. But I have no knowledge of a single instance heretofore of appropriating lands out of a State as a general distribution. If I am wrong in that, I am wrong in my conclusions in reference to this question.

I have no disposition to consume the time of the Senate, or to prevent its action. If it is the will of the majority to pass the bill, let it be so. I have only thought it due to myself, as I was the first to make objection to the bill, to state more explicitly the objections which I have to it, inasmuch as I differ from several Senators with whom I am in the habit of acting.

Mr. BAYARD. As it will be impossible for me, with my views of the Federal Constitution, to give my vote for the bill before the Senate, and as the object is one which appeals strongly to our benevolent feelings, I cannot give, in justice to myself, a silent vote against the bill.

Sir, I have the profoundest respect and the highest admiration (without the pleasure of a personal acquaintance) for the lady to whose exertions it is understood this bill owes its origin; but I must, in reference to this measure, for the very reason that it is a beneficent measure, and calculated to appeal to our best feelings, look to its object, to ascertain whether it comes within the powers conferred by the people of the country to the Federal Government. No matter how just it may be; no matter how beneficial; if it does not fall within the powers delegated to the Federal Government, it is impossible that with my views I can support it; because I believe that if there be any one thing more than another which is to render permanent the union of these States it is a rigid adherence to the principle of the limited powers in the Federal Government. The example of to-day, though the object may be a beneficent one, may be followed as a precedent to-morrow, in some other case where personal or political advancement, or sectional interest, will override the principles or even the letter of the Constitution. With these views I shall be compelled to oppose the bill; and I desire, therefore, to state, as briefly as I can, the ground on which I suppose that the appropriation asked for does not fall within the limits of the Federal authority.

Mr. President, we all admit that the principle of republican governments, the principle upon which our State governments are founded, is what is commonly called the social compact; that is, the consent of the governed. Not that where a people exist in sufficient numbers, and have sufficient power to make and maintain their laws, which alone authorizes a political organization, there is any positive agreement by which every man assents to the laws which are made; but that as a necessary result of the organization, the theory is, that the power resting in the people at large, the political axiom must be assumed—that the will of the majority is the evidence of the consent of the whole. It is assumed, I suppose, upon this basis, that every man is presumed, whatever his own individual opinions may be, to assent that the determination of the majority shall be held to be the will of the whole political community, as organized. This implied consent is the foundation, at all events, of republican Governments, trace it to what principle you may, and is, I believe, what is usually called the social compact, upon which all our different State governments rest. It is, in part, also, the foundation of the Federal Government, but its application there is modified. The Federal Government is formed by the express compact of separate nations, existing as separate States at the time when they formed it; and the Constitution of the United States is the evidence of the terms upon which that Government was established. It delegates specially the powers to which that Government is entitled, so far as language can define them. And it restricts and prohibits the exercise of any power which is not necessary to carry the delegated powers into execution. The Federal Government, then, Mr. President, is not a pure democracy; it is a mixed republic. In its operation it is national, because it acts directly upon the individual citizen, and not through the political organization of the State of which he is a member; but in the extent of its powers it is federal. Its powers are limited by a written instrument—the Constitution of the United States—and the language of that Constitution is, that “all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States;” not the general powers of legislation.

With this view of the Federal Constitution, let us look to the principles by which, or the objects to which, it was the intention of those who framed the National Government to confine the powers which were delegated. I could not, by any possibility, give a better classification than is given by Mr. Madison in the forty-second number of the Federalist. There he divides them into six classes: First, the powers giving security against foreign danger; second, the powers relating to the regulation of intercourse with foreign nations; third, the powers of the Government which were necessary for the maintenance of harmony and proper intercourse among the States; fourth, certain miscellaneous objects of general utility; fifth, the restraining of the States in certain injurious acts; and sixth, the provisions for giving efficacy to all these powers.

Now, Mr. President, the object of this bill is to provide for the establishment of municipal institutions in the several States of this Union, by means of a donation through the Government of money arising from the sales of the public lands, or, if you please, a donation of the lands themselves; I do not care which. Is that object within the intent of the Federal Constitution? Does it come within any of the classes of powers which I have mentioned? Sir, the word “constitution,” or constitutional, may be used in two senses. An act may be unconstitutional as violating the spirit and intent of the Federal Constitution, though it may not be such a violation of its letter as would enable the judiciary to avoid the act, or pronounce it merely void. Take an illustration of the two cases in which the act would be equally unconstitutional, though it might be that it would not fall within the remedy of judicial restraint in the one, and yet would in the other: The President is authorized, under the Constitution, to convene the two Houses of Congress on extraordinary occasions. Suppose the President so lost to a sense of duty as to issue a proclamation requiring Congress to be convened, grounded on extraordinary circumstances, you cannot question his authority to do that. He is not obliged to specify the particular facts which constitute the extraordinary occasion on which his proclamation is founded. The discretion is vested in him generally. Suppose when you met under such a proclamation it was found that the “extraordinary occasion” of the President was merely to pass a private bill for the relief of some private claimant; would any man doubt that it would be a gross violation of the Federal Constitution? It would not be such as the judiciary could reach, I admit; it would not avoid the legality or constitutionality; in that sense the session of Congress would be well convened, because the matter is left in the discretion of the President. The act would be legal and binding on the people of the country, and the laws passed at such a session would be valid; but the abuse of power on the part of the President, in calling that an extraordinary occasion which referred merely to the relief of an individual claimant, without interest to the nation at large, would certainly be a gross violation of the Federal Constitution.

Let us take another instance in which it would clearly be within the power of restraint: The Constitution gives to the President of the United States the power, when Congress disagree as to their time of adjournment, to adjourn them to any day he pleases. Suppose one House of Congress passed a resolution for the adjournment on a particular day, and it is taken up in the other House, and a motion is made and carried to alter that day and fix a subsequent one; there is a disagreement beyond all question. One House has amended and not agreed to the proposition of the other as to the day of adjournment; but the disagreement is not a disagreement within the meaning of the Constitution, which would authorize the President to adjourn both Houses of Congress; and if he attempted to do it under such circumstances his act would be merely void; the disagreement contemplated by the Constitution being a final disagreement, in which each House adheres to its day, and refuses to adopt any other. In that event alone the Executive has authority to act. The act of the President in adjourning Congress before a final disagreement would be merely void, and would not be simply an abuse of discretion, but the exercise of an authority not within the terms of its grant; but in either case there would be a violation of the Constitution.

I hold, then, that in a deliberative body, (though in a court of justice it would not be so)—in Congress—the words “constitutional” and “unconstitutional” have quite as much application to the abuse of a power delegated in general terms, as to the assumption of ungranted powers, though the effect would be, when you pass the law in the one case the judiciary have no power to revise your actions; but if you pass it in defiance of the objects of the Constitution, though you may have the absolute power to do so, beyond judicial restraint, yet you are violating that Constitution which you have sworn to protect. It is in this sense that the words “unconstitutional” is always used in Great Britain. They have what they call their constitution, and I may be permitted to say, that I think they adhere to their constitution and constitutional principles rather more rigidly than the Congress of the United States does to ours. They have no constitution, within the meaning of the term as used by us, which restricts the power of Parliament, for Parliament is really omnipotent; but you hear the language constantly used, where the organic laws at the foundation of the form of government there will be violated by the principle of a bill which is introduced. In such cases it is denounced as an unconstitutional exercise of power. It is in that sense that I mean to say that the proposed bill is unconstitutional, and I shall be compelled to vote against it.

I can find, in the classification of powers given by Mr. Madison, no authority to Congress to establish poor-houses in the States; no authority to Congress to establish poor-houses for insane persons in the States any more than for those who are not insane. It seems to me that if you once adopt this measure, you will be opening the door to the exercise, on the part of Congress, of a species of interference indirectly with those subjects which are exclusively meant to be matters of State legislation, according to the provisions of the Federal Constitution. That will be an abuse of your power.

I think some Senator, perhaps the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] contended in reference to the public lands, that you had the absolute power of their disposal, and therefore it would not be unconstitutional to appropriate them to this object. I hold it to be not so. You have the absolute power of raising money; you have the absolute power of the appropriation of money. It is in your discretion, if you choose to appropriate out of the Treasury twenty thousand dollars for any object; but the Constitution would be violated, unless the object was within the scope of your powers; and I cannot possibly distinguish between the appropriation of money out of the Treasury, and the appropriation of land or other property of the United States. The phrase used in the Constitution is “territory or other property” of the United States—territory which has been purchased with the money of the public Treasury. Where is the distinction? If Congress can override the Constitution by appropriating to an object not within the intent or purpose of that Constitution, is there not an end of your federative form of Government, as regards the power of appropriation? If the Government is federal in the extent of its powers; if it has no right to exercise powers not within the scope and object of the Constitution, surely no Senator will deny that it was not intended that the municipal regulations of a State, under the pretext of providing for the welfare of the inhabitants of this Union, should be interfered with by Congress. Certainly it would not be contended that you had a right to build jails for the purpose of confining the criminals of a State, or make an appropriation out of the Treasury for that purpose; and under what distinction is it, that when you have no right to do that, you can build poor-houses for the occupancy of the poor of the States, or build hospitals for the insane poor? I can see no difference between the exercise of the one power and the other. In short, it seems to me that if you can make an appropriation of money or lands for the purpose which this bill contemplates, and you can restrict the State by your bill to the application of the land or money so granted to that purpose, and that purpose alone, it is a direct and palpable interference with the State sovereignty in relation to a subject-matter over which the State has exclusive jurisdiction, and over which the Constitution has vested no jurisdiction in Congress.

I hold, therefore, that though it may be, and was, absolutely necessary that, in confiding the powers of legislation delegated in the Federal Constitution to the General Government to use general terms, and to confide general powers, such as to make peace, to make war, to raise money on imports without any express limitation, to appropriate money without any express restriction other than the discretion of Congress—these powers must be exercised for the purposes to which the jurisdiction of the General Government applies; and if you do not exercise the power of appropriation for a purpose to which the jurisdiction applies, you are violating the Constitution in your appropriation. Why, sir, would any honorable Senator contend here that it is within the power of the Congress of the United States to provide by law for the erection of hospitals for the indigent insane within the States? Put it in that form. Suppose you authorize the erection of a hospital for the indigent insane directly in a State. I ask, would that not be the assumption of a power not delegated, and inevitably void? If you have no right to do it directly, on what principle is it that those moneys which are confided to your hands, as collected from imports, or those lands which you bought with moneys collected on imports, and which became the common property of the people of the country, can be appropriated for a purpose which Congress have no authority to perform, in the national and proper operation of its laws, upon the citizen directly, instead of through the political medium of the States?

Mr. President, independent of this question connected with the constitutional provision, I could not, with my view of what is necessary for the permanence of this Government, ever agree to make the States the mere pensioners of the General Government for any purpose whatever which is within their jurisdiction, and not within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. I know, sir, that this bill might be beneficial to my State. There may be, there are, other measures which would be beneficial to my State, and to other States, which Congress has no authority to pass; and it is, however, of far deeper ultimate interest to the people of my State, and of far deeper interest to the people of every State of this Union, in my judgment, that Congress shall be held to the powers intended to be confided by the Constitution, unless the people will, in a proper manner, agree to amend that Constitution, of far more abiding interest than if they got thousands, ay millions of dollars for any purpose whatever, by an invasion of the Constitution.

Sir, you may commence this system, founded upon a beneficent project, which may meet the approval of every man's judgment; but make the first inroad upon the Constitution, and it will be followed certainly by projects of every kind in which the rights of the States will be overridden, and the Federal Government will concentrate in itself all power; and not only this, but it will lead to dangerous projects of sectional advancement. State combinations, through the means of that power of Congress will be entered into; and the moment you trample upon the restrictive principles of the Constitution, they will be brought into exercise for sectional purposes. When that time comes, the spirit of resistance will arise in those States which are denied the common benefits of the common property of the Union. The effect will be corruptive also. Power always tends to corruption. The great support which is hereafter to maintain the Federal Government must arise from its abstinence in the exercise of even doubtful powers, and that abstinence must be confirmed by a settled, persistent determination to abide by that rule of the Constitution which requires the application of granted powers to objects within the jurisdiction of Congress, and none other; leaving other matters of beneficial legislation where the Constitution meant them to be left—to the States, and to the people of the States respectively.

Mr. President, the principles which I have advocated originate not with me. There is not one principle I have enunciated which you cannot find in the discussions on the Federal Constitution, which were had before the people of America, before the adoption of the Constitution, and understood and known to be the most pregnant arguments which induced the States and the people to adopt that Constitution. This discussion, too, took place long before that article was inserted which subsequently, in express terms, restricts the powers of the Federal Government to delegated powers, and reserves to the States and people all others. I will read (for it is well to recur at times to the opinions expressed in that day)—I will read one or two passages from the Federalist, as illustrative of the opinions which I have advanced; and I think they will fully sustain me. On page 241 of the Federalist, No. 39, in a number written by Mr. Madison, speaking of the relation and extent of powers, he uses this language:

"In this relation, then, the proposed Government cannot be deemed a national one, since its jurisdiction extends to certain enumerated objects only, and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects."

I ask you, where is this object of providing for the indigent insane, or any similar object, enumerated in the Constitution? Does it come within the classification of powers? It has no connection clearly with the security against foreign danger. It has no connection with the intercourse with foreign States. It has no connection with the third class of powers, for the maintenance of proper harmony and intercourse between the States. It has no connection with the miscellaneous objects, because they are specified, such as copyright, patent laws, the jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, and the power over the public lands. The last power was confided for no such purpose as legislation for beneficial municipal objects. All control and regulation of such matters are reserved for the exclusive jurisdiction of the State governments. According to the language of Mr. Madison, there is left in them in this respect a residuary and inviolable sovereignty. Sir, I am unwilling to violate that sovereignty.

Again, on page 292, in the 45th number of the Federalist, he holds this language:

"The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government, are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce, with which last the power of taxation will, for the most part, be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects, which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people; and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State."

Is not a provision for the indigent insane an object which, in the ordinary course of affairs, relates solely "to the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of a State?"

I ask, then, within which of these classes does the provision of building hospitals for the indigent insane come? It appears to me, sir, that we had far better trust for the exposition of the intent and object of the Federal Constitution, if there be any doubt about its objects in this case, to those who explained it to the American people, and who confessedly led to its adoption by the force of their arguments, than to trust now to a loose and dangerous construction, which will lead us to an indefinite exercise of power, simply because the object proposed is of an unquestionably benevolent character.

The argument comes to this: That though the power may be confided, in general terms, as was absolutely necessary in reference to the general power, that is, the power either to collect moneys into the Treasury, through the means of imposts, or the power of the appropriation of money in the Treasury, though there is no limitation expressed in terms, both powers are necessarily confined, by implication, arising from the structure of the instrument, to objects within the Federal Constitution, to objects which the General Government was organized to carry out. If this be not the construction of the Constitution, this Government ceases to be a Government of limited powers.

I have read enough to indicate the coherence of my views with those expressed by one of the authors of the Federalist, at the time when the Constitution of the United States was before the people of the several States for adoption or rejection, on objections made to it as to the abuses to which it would be liable. These reasons were spread broadcast throughout the country. These letters, which, by general acknowledgment, are regarded as of surpassing ability, and as splendid specimens of profound reasoning, explained the provisions of the Constitution, the object of the Federal Government, its nature, and the extent to which its powers were to be applied; and these explanations undoubtedly had a powerful effect. Ultimately, the States of this Union adopted this as a National Government. It is a National Government, but established by free and independent States, by an express compact, delegating special powers of government, and subjecting it to all the restrictions upon its powers which are expressly imposed by the terms of the grant, or which arise, by implication, from the mode in which it was organized.

Mr. President, I have now expressed, as briefly as I could, the views which I entertain in reference to the true construction of the Federal Constitution. I say, then, that if a bill is proposed which appropriates either land or money—and I cannot see that the land of the Government is not the same as the money of the Government—for a purpose which is strictly a municipal purpose, for a purpose which is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the States, I must consider it as transcending the powers of the Federal Government. Though the effect of the appropriation proposed by the bill under consideration may, in this case, be beneficial to my own State; though it may be agreeable to my own feelings; though I may earnestly desire to see institutions such as are proposed to be established by the bill, established throughout every State of the Union, yet I cannot consent, for the reasons which I have stated, to violate what I believe to be the true and only safe construction of the Federal Constitution.

Sir, I had intended to pursue the application of these remarks in reference to an amendment which I contemplated offering to some of the railroad bills, as they are called, which passed the Senate on an occasion when I was not present. I do not know that it is strictly in order to do so, but I believe that under the course which debate usually takes in the Senate, I may apply now the principles which I have laid down. Perhaps I am the more justified in doing so, from the fact that, owing to misapprehension on the part of the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] a bill to which I had intended to propose an amendment, which amendment was submitted as one to be proposed, and ordered to be printed, was taken up on the first morning when I was absent from the Senate Chamber, and passed without my having an opportunity to explain the principle on which my amendment rested. In addition to that, not only was the particular bill to which the amendment was submitted passed, but the amendment, which was general in its design, looking to all railroad bills, was entirely disregarded, not even considered, and some eight or nine bills, granting away millions of acres, were hurried through the Senate without my having an opportunity to explain my amendment, or state my objections to those bills as reported. I will do so now; it will take but a very short time, and the matter is very plain and simple.

I presume that almost all the members of the Senate who belong to the political party to which I am and have been attached, will agree with me that the General Government has no power directly to appropriate lands or money for the purposes contemplated in those railroad bills generally. I presume, in other words, that it is considered now (I admit there have been great fluctuations) a settled doctrine of the Democratic party that the General Government cannot make appropriations out of the Treasury for a general system of internal improvements. I am perfectly aware that, many years ago, the Democratic party passed bills making such appropriations to corporations, which would be voted down now; and there have been fluctuations of opinion on this question at different times. I hold myself bound, therefore, by no precedents in that respect, but bound to adhere to what I believe to be the proper construction of the Federal Constitution. I have stated that it is now settled Democratic doctrine that the General Government cannot appropriate land or money for a general system of internal improvements in the States. Honorable Senators from the land States, however, say that there is a distinction in regard to the public lands. They say that, though you have no right to appropriate the public lands to all the States, you may justify their appropriation to the States in which they lie for the purpose of making roads and canals, on the ground that the particular improvement enhances the value of the residue of the property which the Government holds as a great landholder; and that, as the Government holds large quantities of land in the States, it would be both unjust and inequitable for it to take advantage of the improvement in the value of its lands resulting from the expenditure of the capital of a State, or the capital and enterprise of the citizens of a State, without contributing in some way to this increased valuation.

Sir, there is a great deal of equity in that distinction; and the only question which arises in my mind is, as to the adoption of the mode in which they expect to get at that equity. They deny the right of the General Government to make appropriations of land or money for purposes of general improvement in the States. They claim the right to appropriations of land for railroads or canals, to the individual States in which the lands lie, on the ground that it is the duty and interest of the Government, not as a Government, but as a great landholder, to contribute its proportion to the increased value of the lands which it owns. There is great force in the equity of this principle. Now for its application.

The bills which have been introduced as model bills, all resembling each other, provide that alternate sections of land on the line of a railroad, for a distance of six miles on each side, shall be granted to the State which is to make the road, and that the even sections shall be reserved for the benefit of the United States, and the minimum price of them doubled; but this is to take effect only after the road is definitely located. There is a further provision, however, that if, within the distance of six miles on each side of the road, the lands have been previously taken up by preëmptioners, or by any other persons under the authority of the United States, the State shall be entitled to go nine miles further back, on each side, for the purpose of making up the deficiency. That is intended to secure her, so that she shall receive the full benefit of the grant which is made. Now, what is the correlative advantage secured to the United States as the landholder? for it is upon the principle that it will be an advantage to the Government, as a landholder, that these appropriations are claimed. Why, the United States are to have their remuneration in the increased price of what remains of the even sections within six miles on each side of the road. Take the case of the bill which was passed the other day for the State of Louisiana, and the effect is striking. In that State nearly all the public lands have been offered for sale, and in the interim between the time at which you pass the bill making the grant, and the period of time when the location of the route is definitely fixed, speculators have the right to enter upon these lands at the rate of $1 25 an acre, and take them up; and, as the route is known, the managers of the affair will take up all those lands which you nominally reserve to the Government at $2 50 an acre. The result, therefore, is, that the State gets the benefit of the grant, and the landholder actually makes only a nominal reservation, and will never receive any benefit, because all the reserved lands will be gone before the route is definitely located. That will and must be the practical effect. The provision, as it exists in the bills which have passed, neither benefits the settler nor the Government; but it enables the speculator in public lands to acquire fortune without labor. It stimulates and increases the spirit of speculation in the public lands, already a serious evil, and requiring restraint instead of encouragement.

What, then, was my offer, as contained in my proposed amendment? We have been told by Senators on this floor, in answer to objections such as I have mentioned, that experience has indicated that the Government sales have been increased by this course, and that the United States have received a greater amount from the reserved sections, in some cases, than they would have received from the whole, if the alternate sections had not been granted to the States for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads. I do not deny the truth of these allegations. No specific statements have been made; but it has been generally and broadly asserted that the interests of the Government, as a landholder, have been benefited, because the value of the reserved lands has been greatly increased, and the sales by the Government have been exalted in consequence of the construction of these roads. Admitting all this to be so, what was the amendment which I intended to submit? Now I beg to call the attention of Senators to it, and to ask them to look at it calmly, and without prejudice.

Admit the equity which arises from the fact that State capital, and the enterprise and capital of the citizens of a State, improve the value of the lands through which such an improvement may be made; and suppose that enhanced value of the lands extends to fifteen miles on each side of the road; my amendment proposed that the entire benefit of the improvement should go to the State. It proposes that there shall be a reservation from sale of the public lands along the route on which a road is located by a State, and that the State shall have the right to sell all the lands, both odd and even sections, for fifteen miles on each side of that road, for what price she pleases; and then all we ask of her is, that semi-annually she shall account for the land which she sells, and pay into the Treasury the minimum price of our public lands. The State may sell the lands for $2 50, $5, $10, or $20 an acre; but all we ask is, that she will pay us $1 25.

Now, I ask, if the principle on which these appropriations are claimed is correct, whether it can be denied that the basis which I propose is a true and liberal basis for a landholder to act upon? He says, "Here are my lands, in a wild state; I hold them at $1 25 an acre, as their minimum price; I do not want to get the advantage of your enterprise or capital in increasing their price without a contribution on my part; and, therefore, you shall have the whole benefit for ten years of the sales of the lands within fifteen miles of the road; and you may sell them for the highest price you can obtain; and when you sell them, you need only pay the minimum price of the lands in their unimproved state, and I will issue patents to the persons to whom you chose to sell them." Is not that a fair and liberal proposition? Is not that the utmost extent to which, on any principle of equity, the land States have a right to ask the General Government to go? This allows a State which makes a road to receive the entire increase of value resulting to all the lands on both sides of the road from its construction; and the Government, under any circumstances, gets nothing more than the minimum price of her land. If the lands should happen to be worthless, the State could sell the valuable portion, but need not take the worthless part. The State is under no obligation to pay until she sells; and the title does not vest until she pays.

That is the principle of my amendment; that is what it provides for. I should like to hear some gentleman show me how, on the ground of any distinction as to the duty of the General Government as a landholder, not to take advantage of State capital and State enterprise without remuneration, the new States can object to the principle of my amendment, which provides that they shall receive the entire benefit of their own internal improvements. If it be true that those improvements have the effect which has been stated here—and I do not doubt it—the grant to the State which I propose is far more valuable than the grant which the bills, as passed by the Senate, contemplate. Let me illustrate the difference by a reference to the bill which the Senate passed the other day, granting lands to the State of Louisiana for a railroad.

By that bill, according to a statement which has been prepared for me by the clerk of the Committee on Public Lands, there are 231,000 acres of the reserved lands within six miles on each side of the road which would belong to the United States. I take it for granted there would not be much, if any, difference in the average result as to the quantity in the odd and even sections respectively, and hence we may presume that the State would receive 231,000 acres. The United States reserve that amount, whether they ever get it or not. The State will certainly get it, because she has a right to go back nine miles further if she cannot get the land within six miles of the road; and hence she can always obtain the full amount of the appropriation. The value of the lands appropriated by that bill, at $1 25 an acre, would be $288,750; or doubled in value at $2 50 per acre, $577,500. Now take the grant which I propose to make by my amendment. I propose to grant the entire lands to the State, to be subject to her unrestricted control for a period of ten years. That is surely long enough; but if gentlemen wish a longer time, I shall be willing to agree to it. Suppose you were to reserve the whole, without reference to alternate sections, there would necessarily be 462,000 acres within six miles of the road, and according to my amendment, the State would have the control of this quantity for ten years, could sell it for whatever she pleased, only paying to the Government the minimum price of $1 25 per acre. If, however, you run nine miles further back, so as to include the land within fifteen miles of the road, you find that, according to my amendment, the State would have a right to control for ten years the sale of 1,155,000 acres. The State would have the right to sell that whole quantity for what sum she chose within ten years.

Gentlemen have stated on this floor that where roads have been made through the public lands, there is no difficulty in selling them at $2 50 an acre on the average; and they have assumed that the average increase of the value of the lands within fifteen miles of the road will be equal to that. Then, according to my amendment, the State would receive $1 25 an acre for one million one hundred and fifty-five thousand acres, and would thus get more than twice as much as she receives from the grant of two hundred and thirty-one thousand acres at the increased value of $2 50 per acre. Then the value of the grant, under the terms which I propose for settling this question, would be at least twice, if not three times, as great to the States as the value of the grants which have been made to the States by the bills which the Senate have passed.

The difference between the two propositions is simply this: Under the provision which I have submitted for the consideration of gentlemen, the Government of the United States retains her public lands, and gives nothing; but she merely says to all the land States, "make your own improvements; we will not interfere with them; we will make the interest of the State concurrent with that of the Government; we will authorize you, and you alone, to sell the lands within fifteen miles on each side of the road, for the next ten years; if that road improves the value of the land, as you say, and we believe it does, then you will be amply remunerated for the expenditure which you make in the construction of the road." If, on the other hand, the principle incorporated into the bills which have passed the Senate be adopted what is it but an illusion from beginning to end? You admit that you cannot give lands, or money arising from them, to the States generally. Gentlemen say that is unconstitutional, and they draw a distinction between the power to appropriate in that way, and the duty of the Government, as a landholder, holding the lands in the individual States; and they insist upon an equity which I recognize.

In the mode in which they propose to apply it, if an individual were the owner and grantor, it supposes him to be so great a fool as to make the grant without any benefit to himself, and that removes the whole equity, and leaves in the case of the Government a mere grant for general internal improvements, confined to particular States. Do gentlemen suppose that an individual landholder would make such a grant, unless he could, in some way, derive benefit from it? If you grant away two hundred and thirty-one thousand acres for one road, it is a clear donation of that amount. On the principle of increasing the price, so as to justify this donation, you authorize the doubling of the minimum price of reserved sections, and you withhold them from private entry or preëmption, for sale. Yet, in point of fact, this is entirely illusory; for, before the lands are reserved for the Government, by the definite location of the road, they are taken up by private entry, and thus the Government actually gives away the land, without the slightest benefit to the nation, as a landholder, though as an internal improvement, made, in part, by her assistance, it advances, through the increased wealth and prosperity of the State, the prosperity of the Union; but this mode of advancing the prosperity of the Union, by Government donations, is held to be unconstitutional when applied to States in which no public lands are held.

Then, Mr. President, admitting, as I do, the distinction which gentlemen draw as to the right to appropriate the public lands in the land States for purposes of internal improvement, and admitting the equity of the principle, as applied to those States, my proposition carries out that equity to the full extent of the improvement, and gives the whole value of it to the States which make the improvement. It effects what any great landholder might do. It gives the whole benefit of the improvement to those who make it, and retains the value of the lands as unimproved lands. The proposition in the bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and passed by the Senate, is illusory, and is, in fact, nothing more than making an appropriation of public lands for general purposes of internal improvement to the States in which they lie, under a nominal distinction which is abandoned in the manner in which it is carried out by those bills. Sir, I cannot distinguish any such power in this Government, as between the States in which the lands lie and States in which they do not lie. You might as well tell me that because, in the State of New York you actually receive into your Treasury two thirds of your revenues from imposts, therefore that State has a right to claim disbursements from the National Government commensurate with the receipts from imposts, as to tell me that, because other property of the United States is situated in particular States, therefore those States have a right to claim that that property shall be disposed of for their peculiar benefit.

The language of the Constitution as to land or territory is, that "Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other property belonging to the United States." Thus, the power of Congress over land is placed in the same position as their power over other property. Originally the land of the Government was acquired by cessions from the States. For whose benefit were those cessions made? For the benefit of the National Government, and to be applicable to the general purpose to which the jurisdiction of the National Government attached. Mr. Madison, in the course of his letters in the Federalist, states it so, decidedly, and explains the object and intent of the provision. He says that at that time they looked to the lands as a source of revenue to the country at large, and that the individual States had yielded and ceded their claims with liberality to the General Government, for the general purposes of the whole country; but to be used—how? Like any other property, with the restriction that the lands ceded should be used so as to carry out the objects and purposes for which the Federal Government was constituted—for such objects and purposes as fell within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government as constituted under the Constitution, and internal improvements within the States is not one of them. When, in the application of the lands, you do not make the donation on the principle of which I have spoken, of contributing part of the lands for the improvement of the residue, and reserving section for section, or of giving to the State the entire benefit of the improvement which she pleases to make, and reserving to the Government the value of the land as it existed, without reference to the improvement, it seems to me plain that you violate the Federal Constitution, whether you appropriate the land to the land States, or the States at large. You violate it just as much as if you appropriated money out of the Treasury for the same purpose of internal improvement; and it is to me a matter of astonishment that any distinction should either be pretended, or contended for, as having a real existence.

I know, sir, that from individual desire for wealth; I know, still more, that from the desire for the increase of a State in wealth and in population, the barriers of the Constitution are too often broken down, or its provisions disregarded; but I will still hope, until finally convinced by sad experience, that the wisdom of our forefathers has not gone for nothing, that there will be, after discussion, sufficient adherence to the great principles of the Constitution, sufficient desire to maintain this Government as it was organized, as a limited Government, as to induce the members of this body to refuse appropriations which are partial and sectional in their character, and which are made for an object not within the intent of the Federal Constitution.

Sir, sectional distinctions may arise from other causes than the existence of slavery. Any improper exercise of the powers of the General Government for the benefit of one section alone, whilst the same exercise of power is refused for the benefit of the country at large, generates sectional feelings and sectional jealousies; and I shall always be found opposed to the exercise of any power which has such a tendency.

I think I give strong evidence that it is my desire to adhere in good faith to what I regard as the proper construction of the Federal Constitution, when I state that I shall vote against the bill which is now before the Senate. It is one which I am sure it would gratify me, as an individual, if I could vote for. It is one, as I have stated before, which would be a benefit to my constituents in the immediate act, not in the ultimate result, involving, as it does, a violation of the Constitution. Sir, mine is a small State. It is a State of limited means; but, thank God, there is sufficient providence in its people to have kept them out of debt. I thank God, further, that there has been sufficient wisdom on the part of its rulers to have prevented them—for the sake of power and wealth, as the sole objects of human life, or the sole measure of human prosperity—from embarking their State government in a system of internal improvements, which, however it may add rapidly to a population, and however you may count up the cities to which it may give rise, or the millions of wealth which it may aggregate together, by developing the resources of the people, yet will ultimately tell, as in some of the States of this Union it has already told, most fearfully, in the corruption of the political morals of the people—those political morals which lie at the foundation of the State as well as the General Governments. Mr. President, whatever may be my confidence in the powers of men for self-government—and they are great as regards the people of this country—I hold it to be certain that the establishment and maintenance of a republican Government, presupposes a general diffusion of morals, and intelligence, and habits of self-government among the people at large, which, until our existence as a nation, has been rarely, if ever, found in the history of the world. It is for the preservation of those habits, it is for the freedom from the corruptions incident to the use of the power of the Government, for purposes better intrusted to individual enterprise, perverted, as it but too often is for personal ends and personal aggrandizement, at the expense of the community at large, that I contend. I believe those States, who have so employed the powers of Government, may have grown rich under its operation, and may have increased in aggregate wealth and population by this hot-house system, but the ultimate effect will, I fear, be anything but beneficial, either to the purity of their own form of government, the real happiness and prosperity of their people, or to the permanency of our republican institutions.

Mr. BROWN. I do not intend, Mr. President, to protract this discussion. It is not my purpose at all to reply to the speech of the Senator from Delaware; I have, however, a few words to say in reply to the remarks which my colleague made this morning, and, as he will understand, certainly in no spirit of controversy; but as we differ about this measure, I wish that my views may go upon the record with his own. I shall not repeat what I said the other day when I gave my views upon the bill.

I do not understand my colleague as calling in question the power of the Government to make such grants of the public land as have been made heretofore for school purposes, for internal improvement purposes, and for the various objects to which Congress has appropriated public lands. He is not understood by me as calling in question the power of the Government to appropriate land, as it has appropriated it in our own State, for example, for public buildings, nor the power to appropriate land, not only to endow colleges, but to establish common schools. He has not questioned the power of the Government to make us a grant of more than a million of acres of land for internal improvement purposes, to erect levees on the banks of the Mississippi, and various other streams in our own State, and in other new States which have had the same sort of grants. My colleague at this very session has introduced one or two bills making grants of alternate sections of land for railroad purposes. In doing this I had supposed that the whole question of power was conceded.

I know that my colleague and myself agree upon one thing—that this Government has no power to make appropriations from the National Treasury for works of internal improvement. He will not pretend to insist that Congress may sell the alternate sections of land which he himself proposes to grant, and then vote back from the Treasury of the United States the precise sum which it had received from the sale of these lands, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the roads. My colleague will not pretend that Congress has power to sell the millions of acres of swamp lands which have been granted to our own State, even at one cent an acre, and then appropriate that money back from the Treasury to erect a levee on the Mississippi river, or on the bank of any other stream. He, therefore, like myself, draws a clear distinction between the power which the Federal Government exercises over the public lands and the power which it exercises over money in the Treasury. My colleague will not pretend for a moment—for I know he is a Democrat, and a strict constructionist—that Congress has power to sell a township of land in our own State, and then take the money for which it has sold that township, and appropriate it to the endowment of a college in that State. Yet all such grants in the form of land, have not only received our sanction, but have received the approval of our votes, upon the ground that the Federal Government administers the public lands upon one principle, and the money in the Treasury upon another principle; that you hold your power over the lands by a tenure very different and more ample than that by which you hold your power over the Treasury of the nation.

Now, I do not understand my colleague as having objected to the exercise of these powers heretofore; and he admits the distinction which I have drawn. He says, however, that heretofore the grants have been made to States within which the lands lay; that land has been given to Mississippi, for example, to Alabama, Louisiana, and other States, but always taken from the public domain lying within the limits of those States. I cannot conceive that this affects the question of power. The land either belongs to the new States, or it belongs to all the States. If it belongs to the new States, to the States within which it lies, then we have no business to come here to Congress and ask you, Mr. President, and your associates here, to dole it out to us. If it is our land, if it belongs to the land States, why should we ask Congress to give it to us? Why not assert our authority over it, take it into possession, and administer it in our own way? If it be, as I suppose it is, the property of all the States, the old as well as the new, then I know not by what sort of reasoning my honorable colleague and other gentlemen will justify themselves in voting to give land to the new States, and refusing to give it to the old States. I say, sir, that if Virginia, and Massachusetts, and other old States have an interest in these lands, like the land States themselves, the same authority which authorizes you to give land to the new States; and the same authority which authorizes you to give land for school purposes, and endow a school, will authorize you to give it to endow an insane asylum. I want to see the astute gentleman from Delaware, who has exercised his ingenuity on this subject, draw the distinction between endowing a college for sane children and a college for insane children.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state the difference to the gentleman in a moment. I cannot account for the reason under which Congress may have acted when they adopted the acts to which he refers; but I can state the reason why I suppose, from the circumstances, they did so act. I know the fact, that the general land system authorizes the reservation of every sixteenth section in a township for school purposes. I know the fact, that the swamp lands, as they are called, have been granted to the States in which they lay. I suppose that was upon the principle which was stated by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, of the right of the Government as a landholder. When Congress were devising a general system for the disposition of the public lands, they organized a land system on the basis of securing every sixteenth section for school purposes, so that it would be an inducement to settlers to go on the lands and purchase them.

So in regard to the swamp lands. They supposed them to have been impracticable and useless as to any benefit to the General Government; and, as they had no authority to enter into improvements on them, in order to drain them, for the purposes of sale, they gave them to the States in which they lay, under the idea that if they were drained by those States, the draining would tend to improve the residue of the lands within the limits of those States. This is what I suppose to be the basis on which the distinction is drawn between making an application of the public lands to the States at large and the States in which they lie. It is a part of the general system conducive to the sale of the lands, but that would not apply to the present bill.

Mr. BROWN. I understand the gentleman's argument perfectly; but he has failed to draw the distinction between the arguments which justify the exercise of power and those which establish its existence. When you gave away the swamp lands for the purposes indicated by the Senator from Delaware, and when you gave alternate sections of land to aid in the construction of a railroad, you gave it because the grant enhanced the value of the remaining lands. That is the reason which in such a case moves you to action. It is the argument by which you undertake to justify the giving away of the public lands; but it certainly does not confer the power on you to give them away. The existence of the power must be there in the beginning, and then you resort to this argument to justify you in the exercise of the power which exists.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 8, 1854.

Sir, if you have no power to give to the State of Mississippi alternate sections of land for railroad purposes, can you assume the power, simply because by granting alternate sections you enhance the value of the adjoining sections? If there is that in the Constitution which forbids the giving of the land, how can you get the power simply because by its exercise you may make the adjoining sections worth twice as much as they were before? This may be a very good argument and a very good reason why you should exercise the power if it exists, but it cannot be the basis of a constitutional right.

Now, if you have no power under the Constitution to give land for school purposes in a township, can you assume and exercise the power, simply because by giving it you may induce settlement there? The fact that the grant will induce settlements may furnish a very good reason why you should exercise the power if it exists; but that fact cannot give the power, if there is an absence of it in the Constitution. If you have power to grant lands for school purposes, for internal improvement purposes, in order to erect public buildings, to give bounties to soldiers, and for the thousand and one other purposes for which you have used them, it is clear to my mind that you have power to grant them to the States to enable the States to erect insane asylums. Then the power to grant land for this purpose existing, I shall have no difficulty in showing that the purpose aimed at in this bill can be justified upon the soundest principles of reason, philanthropy, and everything which is honorable to our common nature. It is a simple question of power, and I derive it from the same source from which you derive power to give land to railroads, to give it for school purposes, and give it to soldiers, and to give it for the thousand and one other purposes for which you have given it from the time you first exercised authority over the public lands down to the present hour.

My colleague talked about this being the first instance in which land was to be given to any other than in the States in which it lay. What did you do when you gave away fifteen or twenty millions of acres—perhaps more, certainly not less—to soldiers, of whom seven or eight thousand, perhaps more, perhaps twenty thousand, were in the State of New York, and went to the land States and located their lands there? Was that giving lands to the States in which they lay? No more than this is giving lands to the States in which they lay. In that case you issued scrip to the twenty thousand discharged soldiers in New York, and they sold the scrip, or located it in the new States. Here you propose to give the State of New York seven or eight hundred thousand, or a million acres of land in scrip, she cannot locate it in her own name, but must sell it to individuals, and in the end it will be located just as bounty warrants are. Then I want to know where is the distinction between the two cases? You issued, say fifteen millions of acres in scrip to the soldiers in New York and Pennsylvania, and they have gone and located their scrip in Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, and the other new States and Territories. Now you propose to issue to those States, say two millions of scrip, under this bill, to be located in the same way. What is the distinction between the two cases? I ask my honorable colleague how can he draw a distinction? It is true, in one case the scrip was issued to individuals living out of the land States; but those individuals sold it to some other individuals who went and located it; and here you issue scrip directly to the States, but the States sell it to individuals, and the individuals at last locate it in the new States, and settle on the lands; so that the effect on the land is precisely the same in both cases, and the principle involved, so far as I can see, is precisely the same.

Having turned this question over in my mind, and having viewed it in every aspect in which it can be looked upon, I have come to the conclusion that no reasonable obstacle can stand in the way of passing this bill on the ground of a want of power. And now I will state a reason suggested by the argument of my colleague why I may vote for the bill.

I hold that the old States have an interest in this land, an interest which we recognize, and which we are bound to recognize, which we practically recognize in the very act of coming here and asking them to vote to give us land for our railroads. I will not ask the old States to yield their interest to me for railroad purposes, and for the purpose of fencing out the floods of the Mississippi river, and other western and southwestern streams. I will not ask them to give up their interest in the swamp lands. I will not ask them to give up their interest to educate the children in my State, as they have done by granting her the sixteenth section of public land in every township for school purposes. I will not ask of them to surrender their interest to promote the interest of my State, and then turn upon them and say, "I will not vote you one solitary acre of this land for any purpose within the limits of your States." While I will be generous to myself, generous even to a fault to my own constituency, I will at least be just to those who have an interest in these lands like that of the people whom I represent.

I do not, however, rise to discuss this question again. My colleague will certainly understand me as not presenting my views, in reply to him, in any spirit of controversy; but I wish to justify the vote which I shall give; and more especially since my honorable colleague will vote on the other side.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not desire to make an argument, but only to answer a few points which have been made by the honorable Senator from Mississippi. I will state the distinction which I take, and which I think he has misapprehended. It is not for me to account for the previous legislation of Congress. I admitted, in the commencement of my argument, that I believed the general power to dispose of the public lands of the nation was precisely equivalent to the power to lay duties without express limitation, or the power to make appropriations out of the Treasury without express limitation, and that the limitations on either power must arise by necessary implication, from the fact that the Constitution founded a Government of limited powers and for limited purposes, and that you cannot make an appropriation either of land or of money for a purpose not within the intent and jurisdiction of that Constitution.

Now, sir, I said I supposed the distinction as to the appropriation of lands in favor of the States in which they lie, by reserving every sixteenth section for school purposes, and in other respects, was on the principle of a landholder. A man owning a large quantity of land, and desiring to sell it, lays it off with those public conveniences, and with those arrangements in detail, which he thinks calculated to produce a sale of the residue of the lands. He lays out public streets. He reserves every sixteenth section for school purposes. His object is to induce the community to buy the residue of his land, and that, I suppose, is the foundation on which the Government did this.

It is not a gift, therefore, but it is an exercise of the absolute power of disposal which rests in the Government, with a view to the interests of the Government, because it promotes the sale of the lands.

The same thing is true as regards the swamp lands. If we were to make a contract with an individual in this way: "If you will drain a certain quantity of land, we will give you a certain quantity; or if you will drain the swamp lands, you can have them," we should have a right to do so, for the effect would be to induce the individual to drain the land, and so benefit the residue of the land of the landholder.

Clearly that is not a gift. There is a consideration in the duty performed, and the object is the benefit of the landholder; and that, in my judgment, justifies the purpose for which it is done, as well as the exercise of the power. The power I do not doubt for a moment. I do not question your power to dispose of the public lands unlimitedly. I only say that you violate the Constitution when you dispose of them and apply the proceeds to a purpose not within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. SEBASTIAN. It is very desirable that there should be an Executive session, and I hope the Senator will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WELLER. With the Senator's permission, I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, so that we may proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. FOOT, and others. Oh no; let us have a vote on the bill.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I would suggest to my friend from Vermont that there is no purpose to delay the passage of the bill by this postponement. I shall vote now for an Executive session; but I pledge myself to him to agree to take up the bill to-morrow in the morning hour.

Mr. DAWSON. Then I will vote with the Senator for an Executive session at this time.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. SEBASTIAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent in the consideration thereof, the doors were reopened, and The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INTERCHANGE OF DOCUMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Chargé d'Affaires of Spain near this Government inclosing, in pursuance of the interchange of parliamentary documents between the Congress of Spain and that of the United States, a printed copy of the official Journal of the Spanish Congress for the year 1853.

The communication was referred to the Joint Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I ask leave to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and accompanying papers of Jere N. Sewall, upon which an adverse report has been made.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose are they to be withdrawn? Are they to be taken from the files entirely, or to be re-referred?

Mr. WALBRIDGE. The memorandum furnished me is not very full, but I presume the object is to return the papers to the petitioner.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks leave to withdraw from the files of the House certain papers, to return them to the owner.

Mr. LETCHER. What are the papers?

Mr. WALBRIDGE. The petition and papers of Jere N. Sewall, upon which an adverse report was made by the Committee on Indian Affairs, at the last Congress.

Mr. LETCHER. What is to be done with them?

The SPEAKER. They are to be returned to Mr. Sewall.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to their withdrawal. Let us keep them on record, in case Mr. Sewall should come here again with his claim. We would then have evidence of what the claim was.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is one of the three days set apart this week for territorial business, by resolution of the House, and I desire that it shall be devoted to that business.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I learn, since I was last up, that Mr. Sewall wants to have his papers withdrawn that they may be referred to the Department. I was not aware of that fact when I made the application before, and I hope there will now be no objection to the withdrawal.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] withdraw his objection to the withdrawal of the papers for the purpose of reference to the Department?

Mr. LETCHER. I did not understand that was the purpose for which the gentleman asked the withdrawal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York states that he was not aware of the fact when first he made the application. He has since inquired of the claimant, and learns that such is the fact.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. FLORENCE. I renew the objection, and suggest that copies be taken instead of the originals. Recent examples, I think, justify me in the objection.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. The course suggested is equally agreeable to the claimant, I suppose.

The order was made accordingly.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing on the Speaker's table in reference to the territories.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Committee on Territories have sundry bills to report. They have not had an opportunity to report them heretofore.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make his reports now. The gentleman from Indiana, however, rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am requested on the part of my colleague, [Mr. MACE], who was confined to his room yesterday by ill health, to express his exceeding regret that he was not able to be here to place his name on the Journal in favor of the homestead bill.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a personal explanation. It appears that the papers which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALBRIDGE] desires to withdraw from the files of the House are to be used at the Pension Department. I modify my previous suggestion so that the papers may be permitted to be withdrawn provided copies of the originals be left on the files of the House, as I understand that the Pension Office will not act upon copies but require originals.

The SPEAKER. Unless objection be made, the order will be that the originals may be taken away, if copies are left on file.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

TERRITORIAL BILLS REPORTED.

Mr. PHILLIPS, from the Committee on Territories, reported back a bill, to be entitled "An act for the construction of certain roads in the Territory of New Mexico," with the recommendation that it do pass; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HIENN. I have a bill creating additional land offices in the Territory of Minnesota, which I wish to report from the Committee on Public Lands, as a substitute for the bill referred to them, with a view that it may be acted upon during the three days set apart for the consideration of territorial business.

The bill was reported back with an amendment, read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union:

A bill to establish additional land districts in the Territory of Minnesota.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Territories, reported back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill to aid the Territory of Minnesota in constructing a railroad for military, postal, and other purposes.

It was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FARLEY, from the Committee on Territories, reported back House bill No. 164, making further appropriations for continuing the construction of roads in the Territory of Minnesota, in accordance with estimates made by the War Department, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

POSTPONEMENT OF THE GRADUATION BILL.

Mr. COBB. This being the day set apart for the consideration of territorial business, I desire not to interpose any obstacle in the way of such consideration. But a special order necessarily comes up so soon as the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole, in reference to a matter which I alluded to yesterday—the graduation bill. I would prefer this matter being considered now; but, for the sake of furthering the territorial business, and the other business which ought to be considered by the House, I now propose to postpone the further consideration of that special order for three weeks from this day, in order to give the House an opportunity of looking into the matter deliberately, and of getting territorial business out of the way. I trust there will be no objection to the adoption of this course.

A MEMBER. It is better to postpone it for four weeks.

Mr. COBB. It is suggested that we put off the special order to which I allude for four weeks. Let us say, therefore, four weeks from this day.

A MEMBER. What is the order in question?

The SPEAKER. It is the consideration of the bill proposing to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands. It is a special order, and would take precedence of territorial business. In order to get out of the way the territorial business fixed for this and the two succeeding days, the gentleman from Alabama proposes that the consideration of this bill be postponed for four weeks from this day.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. COBB. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House now, that a substitute, which I intend to offer for that bill, may be printed, in order that the House may have it before them, and investigate the bearings of it minutely. I trust there will be no objection to this, and the House will allow my substitute to be printed.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I now make a precisely similar proposition. I have a substitute for this graduation bill, and I ask the same order—that it be printed.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

INDIAN AGENTS.

Mr. ORR. I ask leave to report a bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs. I desire to have it referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that it may be considered as territorial business. It is "A bill authorizing the appointment of an additional number of Indian agents."

The bill was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN TITLES TO MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. ORR. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution directing them to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing Indian titles to mineral lands lying east of the Mississippi river, and west of Lake Superior, have instructed me to report a bill.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

A bill to provide for the extinguishment of the titles of the Chippewa Indians in the lands owned and claimed by them in the Territory of Minnesota, and in the State of Wisconsin, and for their domestication and civilization.

Mr. ORR. I move its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

It was so ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let it go with the territorial business. That will answer.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from South Carolina withdraw his proposition to print the latter bill?

Mr. ORR. The latter bill had better be printed. It is a bill of some importance, and if we cannot have it printed in time to consider it, the committee will have to consider it at some future time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Michigan. I gave notice some time since that I should, upon leave, introduce a bill to regulate the proceedings and process of the United States courts. I now ask leave to introduce the bill, and that it may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LETCHER. That does not belong to territorial business.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the bill will be received.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Some members of the Committee on Territories are absent who have reports to make; they can make those reports tomorrow, and I move that this House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on territorial business.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being business in reference to the organized Territories.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The first bill for consideration was read by its title, as follows:

A bill for the construction of roads in the Territory of New Mexico.

It provides for the appropriation of $20,000 for the construction of a road from Taos to Santa Fé; and $12,000 for the construction of a road from Santa Fé to Dona Ana.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is open to amendment or discussion. If no amendment is proposed the bill will be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PHILLIPS] who reported this bill this morning is not now in his seat. I will state to the House that it appropriates $32,000 for the construction of two roads—one from Taos to Santa Fé, and the other from the latter place to Dona Ana. To the first it appropriates $20,000, and to the latter $12,000. The bill is recommended by the officers who have been in command of the military forces in that country, and by the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no amendment, the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. FAULKNER. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] the chairman of the Committee on Territories, if it is within his own personal knowledge that the Secretary of War has recommended the construction of this road from Taos to Santa Fé? I recollect that this subject was before the Committee on Roads and Canals, of which I was a member, at the last Congress; and my impression is, that upon the subject being referred to the then Secretary of War that he thought the road was altogether unnecessary for military purposes, and that his recommendation was not to make an appropriation for that purpose. I should be gratified, before the question is taken, to have some information as to the opinion of the present Secretary of War upon this subject.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would say to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] that the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] who had the matter in charge, and who has all the correspondence in relation to this subject, is not now in his seat, but he will doubtless be here very soon. I can only state to the gentleman from Virginia, that I do not know whether the Secretary of War recommended the road from Taos to Santa Fé or not. There are recommendations in regard to it from officers who have been in command in New Mexico, and they come to us through the War Department. Whether they come with the recommendation of the War Department based upon them or not, I am not able to answer. The recommendations surely come through the War Department, and they recommend the appropriation asked for here for the purpose of constructing this road. Of course, the recommendation of the Secretary of War, having no knowledge, I presume, in relation to the matter except what he derives from others, would be of very little importance, and the recommendations of others would be of greater importance, and it was to their recommendations that the committee gave more consideration than to anything else. I am inclined to the opinion that the Secretary of War did not recommend any more than was recommended by his officers.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill, entitled "An act to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas," and asking the concurrence of the House therein.]

Mr. FAULKNER. I should be gratified to have the views of the War Department upon this subject, because I have a very distinct recollection, when this subject was before the Committee on Roads and Canals at the last session of Congress, that it was referred to me, and that I opened a correspondence with the War Department upon the subject. My conclusion from the correspondence, and from the papers laid before me, embracing all the information within the reach of that Department, was, that the road was wholly unnecessary for military purposes, and an appropriation for its construction would be an improper expenditure if made.

These are my impressions, and being such, I would be gratified to have more accurate information as to the necessity and propriety of the construction of this road before the question is taken.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am very anxious that the gentleman from Virginia should have all the information he desires. I do not, however, wish that the bill should lie over.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Let it be passed over informally.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PHILLIPS] who reported the bill, has correspondence in his possession in relation to this matter. I supposed he was in the House when the bill was called up.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This was a bill reported this morning. Are there no bills which have heretofore been reported?

Mr. RICHARDSON. None at all.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me, then, that we are in a very bad condition to act upon these territorial bills, as none of them are printed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I would suggest that the bill be laid over informally until the gentleman from Alabama comes in.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the bill will be accordingly laid over. The next bill in order is a bill to establish additional land districts in the Territory of Minnesota.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me that we are in a very bad condition for legislating upon these bills. None of them are printed, and I think, if the chairman of the committee would agree to it, that we had better postpone this special order until next Tuesday. Let the bills be printed, and then let the committee make their reports.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Tennessee make objection to these bills?

Mr. JONES. I am not making objection to any of them. I think that we could act more intelligently upon these bills if we had them printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, I have this to say, that since I have been a member of the Committee on Territories it has been the uniform practice to report bills on the day set apart for territorial business, and on going into the Committee of the Whole to consider them upon those days. What I propose to the gentleman from Tennessee is this: That if he has any opposition to make to our bills, to make it to the bills themselves. Let us have a fair, square, and manly fight; no indirect fight. And if these bills will not stand upon their own merits, let them go down.

Mr. JONES. All that I desire is an opportunity to understand them. I am not now proposing to pass them over, and if it is proper to go on with them I have no objection to do so. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if any of the members of the House who have not been upon the committee can understand these bills by merely hearing them read through at the Clerk's desk?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair felt disposed to indulge this debate, but it is not in order until the bills are read, unless some motion is made that the committee rise.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. As the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PHILLIPS] is now in his seat, I trust that the committee will take up the bill which was laid by a few minutes since.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I desire to inquire whether it would be in order to postpone the consideration of all the bills relating to Oregon to some future day; say to this day two weeks?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state to the Delegate from Oregon, as I have stated to the House, that there are bills relating to some of the Territories that require immediate action. I desire that this time shall be set apart for the consideration of those bills. I intend to ask for a week or two weeks in the month of May for the consideration of such territorial measures as are not now ready, and I trust that as other gentlemen from the Territories want their bills passed, he will throw no obstacles in their way. He will have a fair opportunity to present all his bills hereafter.

Mr. LANE. I have not the slightest desire to interfere with the business of any Territory. I desire to see the business of all the Territories taken up, considered, and acted upon. But I hope that the Oregon business will be postponed for four weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion of that kind cannot be entertained by the committee. It rests with the House entirely to postpone this business. If there be no objection the consideration of the bill laid aside informally a few minutes since will be resumed, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PHILLIPS] is now in his seat.

No objection being made, the committee resumed the consideration of a bill to aid the construction of certain roads in the Territory of New Mexico.

The bill was again read through.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I reported that bill by the instruction of the Committee on Territories. Application was made for these appropriations by the Delegate from New Mexico. The Committee on Territories resorted to the source of information which they thought most appropriate, to wit: to the War Department; and it was in accordance with the information which we received from the War Department that the committee determined on reporting the bill which is now under consideration.

The first section of the bill appropriates $20,000 for the construction of a road from Taos to Santa Fé, and the second section appropriates $12,000 for the continuation of that road southward from Santa Fé to Dona Ana.

In reference to the propriety of making these appropriations, we received from the War Department, in reply to an application made there, the following letter from Colonel Sumner, who has been in command in that country, and who is probably as competent to give information upon this subject as any officer in the country. His letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 3, 1854.

I have received your letter dated yesterday, in reference to appropriations asked for New Mexico.

I think the road between Santa Fé and Taos should be repaired, or rather made, for there never has been a practicable wagon road between those two towns, and it is very important that there should be one for military purposes, as well as for the good of the country.

I do not think the $20,000 asked for is too much; but it is enough, if properly expended.

I have some doubt about the propriety of the appropriation of $12,000 for the road from Santa Fé to Dona Ana, unless the design is to use this money in sinking wells and building cabins on the "Jornado del Muerto." If the money is to be used in this way, it would be well applied and of great service to the public. The road is generally level, and very good, with the exception of parts of it that are sandy, and I do not think the business of the country would justify the expense of overcoming this difficulty, either by plank roads or otherwise.

It would seem that between Santa Fé and Dona Ana the road passes through a desert called "Jornado del Muerto," which is entirely without water; which makes it almost impracticable to pass over it.

The second section of the bill which appropriates the $12,000, provides that any portion of that sum may be used for the purpose of sinking these wells in order to make that route practicable and passable. And the recommendation of Colonel Sumner, in reference to that matter, is, that although he would not expend the $12,000 in endeavoring to overcome the sandiness of the road, yet the $12,000 should be appropriated for the sinking of these wells, a work of the highest importance.

Now, sir, the committee, it seems to me, are entirely supported by the very best and highest authority of the country. They have recommended for New Mexico in all $32,000 for making these roads. In casting my eye over the past legislation of the country, to know how far we would be justified in making this amount of appropriation; I find that the following appropriations were made for the purpose of making territorial roads:

For Florida....	July 7, 1838.....	$37,300
For Wisconsin..	July 7, 1838..	$40,000
“ “	Mar. 3, 1845..	10,000
		50,000
For Iowa.....	Mar. 3, 1839..	$27,500
“ “	“ 3, 1845..	25,000
		52,500
For Minnesota,	July 18, 1850.....	35,000
For Oregon....	Jan. 7, 1853.....	40,000

The amount therefore asked in this bill for New Mexican territorial roads is less than any amount heretofore appropriated by Congress for similar purposes to the other Territories. It seems to me, therefore, Mr. Chairman, whether we regard the amount involved in the bill, or the propriety of appropriations, it should receive the favorable consideration and action of this body.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to inquire whether there has been any survey, or any estimate of the cost?

Mr. PHILLIPS. There was no necessity for surveying. They are the roads of the country now used; and the estimates are to be found in the letter read from Colonel Sumner, who was there in command, traveled the roads, and is, of course, competent to give information as to the amount necessary for the purpose. He says that $20,000 is the proper amount for the first purpose, to wit, the roads from Taos to Santa Fé; and $12,000 is the proper amount for making a road from Santa Fé to Dona Ana.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman has had experience enough in legislation to know that when appropriations are asked for, even with estimates to back them, that the appropriations, although the whole amount given may be equal to the estimates, very rarely are sufficient to make the road complete. And I understand that the estimates formed here are formed by a gentleman who rode over the road, who never put an instrument upon it, who does not even describe the character of the ground over which this road is to be made, who does not furnish one single fact of information to this body as to the feasibility of the plan, or as to the cost of the road when it is undertaken. Now, sir, it seems to me that we ought to have something to go by here; that we ought to have an estimate, or a survey, or something of the kind, that would give us some information about it.

And then I take it, besides, that if this road is really so important as it is represented to be, the Secretary of War would have some information on the subject, which he would have laid before the House as a guide for legislation.

Mr. PHILLIPS. It really seems to me that my friend from Virginia is requiring too much under the circumstances. This is not a railroad. Why is it that he wants instrumental surveys of a wagon road, in order to form an estimate of the cost of repairing it? I never heard that a road running through a county, or two counties, or three counties, used by wagons, would have to be surveyed instrumentally before the cost of repairing it was ascertained.

Mr. LETCHER. I imagine when Congress is asked to appropriate money to build a road it ought to have something to base that appropriation upon, just exactly as a State Legislature, to authorize the construction of a road either through one county, two counties, or three counties, should have a survey to ascertain the cost, or something near it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I agree fully with the gentleman [Mr. LETCHER] in the position he takes, that we ought to have something to base our action upon. But the question I asked of the gentleman was, whether it was necessary to have an instrumental survey of the wagon road made before we could form an estimate? We have the estimate. Why has not the Secretary of War furnished information? This is the very information which the Secretary of War has furnished in answer to the application of this committee.

The response of that officer covered the information communicated to that Department by a gentleman who for months was located there, as an officer of high character and of the completest intelligence in reference to this matter. Why, sir, was it necessary for the man who merely traveled over the road with his wagons, with his military tents and paraphernalia—was it necessary for him, I say, to carry instruments and to survey the road? For what purpose? Was it necessary for him to survey it before he could tell what it would cost to make it passable for wagons? Certainly not, sir. It was not requisite to make an instrumental survey of such a road. And we have an estimate which, it seems to me, ought to be regarded by this House as the very highest source of information.

Mr. FLAGLER. There appears to be some difference of opinion on the part of gentlemen in regard to the matters relating to this somewhat remote Territory. I should be glad, therefore, to hear from the gentleman representing the district concerned as to the facts of the case. Other gentlemen besides myself would regard with great respect his opinion on the question.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman over the way [Mr. FLAGLER] permit me, in reply, on behalf of the Delegate from New Mexico. It is well known that he does not possess the use of our language, but if the gentleman desires it I will read a letter from him.

Mr. PHILLIPS then read the following letter from M. GALLEGOS, Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico:

WASHINGTON, February 20, 1854.

SIR: Among the communications sent you by the Secretary of War in relation to roads in New Mexico, I wish to call your attention to the letter from Colonel Sumner. He has traveled over the roads of which he speaks, and is, therefore, well qualified to judge of the necessity of the appropriations asked for.

To repair and make the roads proposed by Colonel Mansfield, and in the manner proposed by him, would not cost less than $50,000, much of which does not now need to be expended.

The appropriation of $20,000 is to repair the road between Santa Fé and Taos, via Sierra Guilla and La Joya, which is the shortest and best of the three roads running between Santa Fé and Taos.

The $12,000 required for the road from Dona Ana to Santa Fé is proposed to be expended in sinking wells. The road is a very good one, and a want of water the only objection to traveling over it, excepting two or three ravines that can be made passable at a very small expense.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. M. GALLEGOS.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no motion to commit the bill, it will be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

It was so ordered.

LAND DISTRICTS.

The CHAIRMAN. The next bill in order is the bill to establish additional land districts in the Territory of Minnesota.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is not the bill in order. The next bill is the railroad bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk is informed by the Clerk that the bill, the title of which has been stated, is the next bill that was reported.

Mr. HENN. Read the substitute.

The original bill was then read.

It proposes that four additional land districts be created, and that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a register and receiver for each of said districts. Also, that the lands within the district shall be brought into market and exposed to sale, upon the same terms and conditions of other public lands of the United States.

The substitute, which was reported by the Committee on Public Lands, was then read. It proposes the accomplishment of the same object, but varies the phraseology and terms thereof.

Mr. RICE. I will state to the committee that there are about twenty millions of acres of land in the Territory of Minnesota, either surveyed or subject to survey. There are between three and four hundred townships already surveyed, and upon those townships there are some two or three thousand inhabitants, but there has been no provision made to enter their lands. The matter was laid before the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and he prescribed the boundaries of the districts. They run from the Mississippi to the Missouri rivers, about three hundred miles. The bill is so worded, that as fast as the lands are entered upon the Mississippi, the President of the United States can remove the land offices back, and thereby save the necessity hereafter of creating new land districts and new offices.

It is important that the bill should be passed at once; and if it be not so passed, the time limited by the preemption law will expire, and persons who have located upon these lands will lose their improvements.

The question was then taken upon the substitute, and it was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is it in order, at this time, to make a motion that the committee rise?

The CHAIRMAN. Such a motion would be in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I then make that motion; and, if the House will allow me, I will give my reasons. These are important bills—more so than many which are upon your table. We cannot act understandingly upon them without having them printed. I make the motion for the purpose of testing the sense of the committee. Should the Committee rise, I will then move, or suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Territories to move, to fix Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of next week, for the further consideration of these territorial matters.

The CHAIRMAN, (interrupting.) The Chair would state to the gentleman from Indiana, that debate is not in order upon a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. DAVIS. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no necessity for the committee rising. The bills which have been reported are short; and if gentlemen will pay attention when they are read, they can understand them. If they are opposed to the bills, and a majority of the committee are against them, let them vote them down; but if that majority is in favor of them, let them pass them. The same difficulty will arise next week that now presents itself. Gentlemen will then say they have not time to consider the bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must also remind the gentleman from Illinois that debate is not in order upon this motion.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to inquire whether it will be in order to ask that a letter from the Secretary of War, sent to me as a member of the committee, in regard to this road between Taos and Santa Fé, may be read?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. DAVIS, and decided in the negative.

So the committee refused to rise.

The bill under consideration was then laid aside to be reported to the House.

GRANT TO MINNESOTA FOR A RAILROAD.

The committee next proceeded to take up and consider Senate bill (No. 138) to aid the Territory of Minnesota in constructing a railroad for military, postal, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to know whether the bill is to be read through for information or for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not be open to amendment until it is read by sections.

The Clerk then read the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This bill proposes to grant land, exclusively under the charge of the Territory, to the Territory, for the purpose of constructing a road. The length of the road is about two hundred miles. The amount of land that the Territory will obtain by the grant is between five and six hundred thousand acres. A portion of the road runs from the head of navigation on Lake Superior to St. Paul, on the Mississippi river. The Government is interested in that road, and the Secretary of War, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, recommends this donation.

I will state to the committee that a portion of the road between St. Paul and Lake Superior, and a most important portion of it, runs through a section of country where it will cost but little more to build a railroad than it would to make a common road. The road runs through what are called in that country "tamarac swamps;" and a common road, such a one as the Government could transport its troops, munitions, and mails upon, would have to be thrown up to such a height, that the only difference in cost between it and a railroad would be the mere expense of laying down the rails.

These swamps prevail, I understand, in a large portion of the interior country through which the road would have to pass. I know nothing about it myself, and my information is of course derived from others. In view of this fact, the Secretary of War recommends the donation proposed in this bill, for the purpose of making this road, to the Territory.

I have nothing to say about the policy of grants of this description. That has been sufficiently vindicated by other measures that have passed Congress. That the Government will lose nothing under it is too clear a proposition for discussion. There is no doubt that it will be advantageous to the Government, because the Government will have to construct a road there of some description, and must do it very speedily. The distance between the head of navigation of Lake Superior and St. Paul, on the Mississippi river, is one hundred and twenty miles. When your troops at St. Paul have to be taken to the point on Lake Superior from which this road starts now, instead of going across the country a distance of one hundred and twenty miles, they must travel some fifteen hundred miles from one point to the other.

There is, then, every reason why the Government should make this donation, in order that this road may be speedily built; and while you are building a road—and I apprehend it is absolutely necessary that one should be built—it will be a great saving to the Government to build one of this description instead of any other. That is all I desire to say upon this subject.

Mr. FULLER. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Territories whether he regards a territorial government as of that permanent character, and as possessing powers that make it proper for this Government to donate to it public lands for the purposes of improvements? Whether that territorial government can contract loans, and enter upon works of internal improvement of a permanent character, and which must necessarily involve time and great expense to consummate? Whether the design of the formation of a territorial government for a mere infant State, until the Territory shall have become sufficiently populous that it may organize and form itself into a State assuming the responsibilities incident thereto—whether this minor, if I may use a figurative expression, is competent to enter into such permanent works of internal improvement? I merely throw this out as a matter of inquiry upon which I should like to hear the gentleman's remarks, for I have not examined the organic law forming that Territory. And I should like to inquire whether there is an instance in our legislation where there has been a grant of lands by the General Government to a territorial government, to enable that territorial government to enter into works of internal improvements?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will answer the gentleman with a great deal of frankness and readiness. I am able to do so. The Government has granted land as the gentleman suggests. If the gentleman will look into the legislative history of this country, he will find that the Government made a donation of the public land, in alternate sections, to Wisconsin, when it was a Territory, for the improvement of Fox and Rock rivers; and also to Iowa, while it was a Territory, for the improvement of the Des Moines river.

Mr. FULLER. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Territories whether these grants which were made to the territorial governments—constituting them the donees—were for the purpose of making these improvements, or whether certain lands were not reserved for educational purposes, as part and parcel of the public domain?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have already stated to the gentleman that the land was granted to the Territories in alternate sections for the improvement of the rivers which I have named. The propositions then passed by Congress were precisely similar to the one under consideration. I am not at all speaking about what was given for educational purposes. I am talking about the improvement of Fox and Rock rivers, in Wisconsin, and the Des Moines river, in Iowa. I hope the gentleman is answered.

Mr. WADE. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Territories about the location of this road. I want to know the distance from the commencement of it to the south line of the Territory of Minnesota?

Mr. RICHARDSON. About two hundred miles.

Mr. WADE. How far is it from the south line of the Territory of Minnesota to the northern terminus of the Central Illinois railroad?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Seventy miles, as I am informed.

Mr. EASTMAN. It is a degree of latitude precisely.

Mr. WADE. Then the whole length will be two hundred and seventy miles. The bill gives the privilege of extending from the south line of the Territory of Minnesota to the northern terminus of the Illinois Central railroad.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This bill makes a donation inside of the Territory of Minnesota. The other gives merely the direction in which the road is to run.

Mr. WADE. Another thing: How far is the commencement of this railroad at the mouth of the Left Hand river to the Mississippi river?

Mr. RICHARDSON. About one hundred and twenty miles. It may be, however, that the distance is a few miles more or less.

Mr. FULLER. I wish to propound one or more inquiries to the chairman of the Committee on Territories. I confess that this subject has been sprung suddenly upon me. I desire to inquire of him whether the Territory of Minnesota has incorporated any railroad company for the purpose of building this road? and I desire, in that connection, to make another interrogatory; whether by the organic law forming that Territory, that territorial government has the right to charter any company whatever, either for banking purposes, or for railroad purposes, for any indefinite length of time?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will answer the gentleman's question, and then I want to ask him one. If I am to be cross-examined by him, I want to cross-examine him in my turn. I think that is fair. Now, to answer his question—"If there be any incorporation," I have to say that I do not know it. I assume there is none, otherwise the gentleman would know it; and I therefore take upon me to state there is none.

Now I want to ask the gentleman a question. Who told him that there was any incorporation in the Territory?

Mr. FULLER. I have not asserted anything, Mr. Chairman; I simply asked the chairman of the Committee on Territories for information on this subject. I know this, however: that at a certain time the Territory of Florida undertook to incorporate a bank; and I know, if my law reading is correct, that that territorial law was pronounced unconstitutional. I do not know, nor have I examined, the organic law creating the Territory of Minnesota; nor do I know what power it has got. I am not informed on this subject. But it strikes me that we are assuming here in this donation of the public domain that that Territory has all the power necessarily incident to a State to carry out these works of internal improvement, when it shall have, two years hence, shuffled off that peculiar condition of infancy in which it now is. If it now assumes bonds, or enters into a contract in this territorial state, what is to be the condition of that contract after it gets into the position of a State? It strikes me that it is a grave question, which requires to be considered; and I suppose the honorable gentleman, the chairman of the Committee on Territories—being a lawyer, and having given the subject deep and careful investigation, not only as to the policy of granting lands generally, but particularly as to these new-born interests of the Territory of Minnesota—is prepared to answer it.

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman from Maine permit me to propound a question to him?

Mr. FULLER. Certainly.

Mr. BISSELL. I want to know if the gentleman from Maine denies to the Territory the power to make roads?

Mr. FULLER. There are various kinds of roads.

Mr. BISSELL. I desire to know whether the gentleman denies to the Territory the power to make a common turnpike road?

Mr. FULLER. I do not. I am not prepared to answer. I think, however, that the Territory may to some extent make roads.

Mr. BISSELL. Then if a Territory has a right to make turnpike roads, can it not also make macadamized roads? And if it can make both turnpike and macadamized roads, I would like to know why it might not, on the same principle, make railroads?

Mr. FULLER. I have great doubts as to whether a Territory has authority to charter a turnpike company.

Mr. HENN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine one question.

Mr. FULLER yielded the floor.

Mr. HENN. I desire to know whether the gentleman denies the right of the Territory to charter a ferry?

Mr. FULLER. Why, Mr. Chairman, to respond to the gentleman from Iowa, as at present advised, I regard the territorial government as I do one of the New England town municipalities—a quasi corporation, that has such powers as the State confers upon it, and nothing more. That is my idea of a territorial government.

Mr. HENN. I asked the gentleman from Maine whether the Legislature of the Territory has a right to charter a ferry?

Mr. RICE. The act establishing the Territory of Minnesota gives her the right to charter any company that States have, excepting banks. But there is a law of Congress which prohibits the chartering of any bank in any Territory. All laws passed by this Legislature of the Territory of Minnesota, under the organic act, are to be binding, unless objected to by Congress. After the passage of all new charters, they are to be submitted to the consideration of Congress.

Mr. FULLER. That suggests to my mind a question, which I will put to the gentleman from Minnesota, and that is, whether there has been any legislation by that Territory upon the subject of these railroads, which has been returned here for the supervision of Congress?

Mr. RICE. The Territory of Minnesota has chartered some three or four railroad companies. Those charters, by the consent of Congress, have become the law of the country. But there is no charter which covers this grant. There is one charter extending from Lake Superior to the western line of the Territory; and another from St. Paul to the southwestern part of the Territory.

The reason why the proviso is put into this bill—that we might have the privilege of connecting with the Illinois Central railroad—was to indicate the direction which the road should take. The bill was worded so as to guard against these very charters.

We are three hundred miles from any settlements south, and in the winter season we are shut out from connection with the settled portions of the States until the ice forms in the Mississippi river.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I desire to propound a question to the gentleman from Minnesota. Who owns the land around the terminus of this road on Lake Superior? I have heard, I may say to the Delegate, that there is a large amount of land, say six thousand acres, held by persons now here, perhaps upon this floor, pressing the passage of this bill.

Mr. RICE. I will answer the gentleman as far as it is in my power. There is not a foot of land upon Lake Superior that is now in market near this point, or that has ever been advertised for sale. There is some subject to preemption rights. I have not been upon the ground for several years, and I do not know that any gentleman in this House has. If they own it they own it contrary to law.

Mr. LANE. Has not one quarter of six thousand acres of land around the terminus of this road on Lake Superior been sold in this city?

Mr. RICE. I am very happy to be able to answer that question. There are not six thousand acres in the Territory of Minnesota upon Lake Superior subject to preemption. The surveys were going on, but in consequence of some difficulties with the Indians the surveyors have abandoned the work. You will find, by reference to the Land Office, that there is nothing like that quantity.

Mr. LANE. I have been informed that there were gentlemen in this city who claim, through Indian or some other title, six thousand acres at the terminus of this road.

Mr. RICE. Other gentlemen in this city, pretending to be heirs of Jonathan Carver, claim fifteen millions of acres. I do not know but there are gentlemen upon this floor that have pre-empted all Minnesota. What I have stated here you will find upon the records of the Land Office. I am willing to answer any question touching this subject.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish the honorable member from Indiana would state what facts he has within his own knowledge in regard to the matter which he suggests. I certainly do not want this bill prejudiced by suggestions of this kind unless they are founded upon facts within his knowledge.

Mr. LANE. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois, I will state that I have understood, from gentlemen of respectability and character, that there are six thousand acres of land in and around the terminus of this road held by gentlemen in this city, and that one fourth of these six thousand acres has been sold since the meeting of this Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. How many hold this land?

Mr. LANE. I propounded to the Delegate from Minnesota that question. I was anxious to know how they sold it, and when they sold it; and now, with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, I will ask the Delegate from Minnesota another question: who sold or claims the land in and around the terminus of this road on Lake Superior?

Mr. RICE. I am unable to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANE.] I can only say that I own none there; that I claim none of it, and that I know of no gentleman upon this floor that has claimed any. I say, that those lands are not in the market, and that they have never been advertised. There are only about two thousand acres which have been surveyed. I went some time ago to the Land Office to see why a proclamation for selling land on the line of the Mississippi river had not been issued. An examination of the map showed me that the survey of those lands was incomplete. If there is any gentleman claiming these lands, I should like the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] to name him. Let us know if there is anything in the dark here. If gentlemen in this city, or any other city, claim six thousand acres in Minnesota, is that any reason why the citizens of that Territory should be deprived of their rights? We are minors, helpless, and now is the time we require aid.

Mr. LANE. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to state another proposition. Being opposed entirely and in toto to giving a single foot of land to any railroad companies—believing that the principle is at war with the homestead bill, which we passed yesterday—I am willing to take any honorable means to defeat every bill of that character. I said here, a little while ago, and I repeat it again, that I have been credibly informed by respectable gentlemen that six thousand acres of this land, at and around the terminus of this road, were held by gentlemen in this city.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will my honorable friend from Indiana permit me to ask him how this land can be held, under the law, by those persons?

Mr. LANE. I am going on to state what I have heard. I do not propose to give the names of gentlemen in this House or in this city, but I will say to my friend from Minnesota and to my friend from Illinois, that if they will call upon me in a proper way I will give them the names of persons holding six thousand acres of this land. I tell these gentlemen that that amount of land is held by gentlemen in this city, and that one fourth of this claim has been sold, since the commencement of this session, for $2,800.

Mr. WASHBURN. I think we should have the names now. Let us know who they are.

Mr. LANE. I have said all I have to say upon the subject. I am prepared, however, to respond to the question whenever it is presented in a proper manner.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask the question most respectfully now.

Several MEMBERS. Let us know who they are. Mr. BISSELL. I believe I have the floor; but I yield it to the gentleman from Indiana, if he proposes to answer the question put to him by my colleague.

Mr. LANE. I have said, and I say again, to the honorable gentleman from Illinois, that I do not propose upon this floor to give those names, but that I am prepared, when called upon in a becoming manner, to respond to the question. I do not vouch for the truth of the statement; I only vouch for the fact that the statement was made to me by a highly respectable gentleman.

Mr. BISSELL. What a mode is this of opposing propositions which are made here to aid in the construction of railroads in that helpless Territory! Is it statesmanlike? Does the man who adopts it act upon very enlarged and liberal principles when he opposes such propositions with—what? With an insinuation that there is something very dark, very suspicious, very fatal to the bill in “my” bosom, if it could be known. What is it? “I shall not tell.” Why? “Because I am not called upon in a proper manner.”

Why, sir, the gentleman from Indiana has chosen his own time and place to let it out, and therefore, I take it, this is the proper time and the proper place to answer the very pertinent question which I put to the gentleman. I suspect that the time the gentleman would desire to give this information would be after the defeat of this bill. I suspect he knows that if the answer were to be given it would not weigh a feather against this bill. That is the construction I put upon it. But what, I pray you, does it amount to, if a particular man does own a thousand acres of land, or ten thousand acres of land, near the line of this road? Of what consequence is it in carrying out this great national scheme, or this great territorial scheme, whichever you may please to call it, intended, as it is, for the benefit of the whole country, and especially for the benefit of the Government itself, as I shall presently show—I say, of what consequence is it who owns the land upon any particular point of the road? Are we going to take these things into consideration in determining what our course shall be in reference to this bill? Are we going to say, that because Mr. A or Mr. B owns a thousand acres here or there upon the line of the road, and has sold out his interest for $1,000 advance since the commencement of the session, that we shall therefore resist the passage of the bill? Are these the principles upon which we are to legislate? I trust not.

Here, sir, is a helpless Territory asking for our assistance. Never has there been a Territory organized by this Government which has not received the public lands belonging to the General Government in the same form, to aid in the construction of internal improvements in that Territory.

Mr. Chairman, when I first heard of the introduction of this bill into the other end of this Capitol—knowing that much importance was attached to the measure; knowing that it was an important military road, and that it would become of very great consequence to the Government of the United States in certain contingencies, as the means of the transportation of troops and munitions of war; and thinking that in that view of the subject I might perhaps be called to act upon it as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House when the bill reached here, in order that I might be prepared to act upon it when it came up, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, inclosing an exact copy of the bill—telling him that I understood it was urged in part upon the ground of its necessity as a military road, and asking him, in view of the possibility that the bill would come before the Committee on Military Affairs, that he would favor me with his views upon that subject. Here is his answer. I ask that it may be read by the Clerk, and then I have nothing more to say upon the subject. I ask the attention of the committee to it.

The Clerk read the communication, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, February 14, 1854.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th instant, accompanying Senate bill No. 138, “to aid the Territory of Minnesota in constructing a railroad for military, postal, and other purposes.”

In reply to your inquiry as to my opinion of the probable utility of the proposed road for military purposes, I will state, that to a people and Government like our own one of the most efficient elements of military power must be railroads leading from the seat of population and supply to assailable points on our frontier. The patriotism of the people will render these interior roads secure for the use of their own Government, and would equally prevent them from being made available by the enemy. The celerity with which, by such means, men and munitions of war may be concentrated at any point so connected with the interior of the country, would render it unnecessary in such cases to call the militia from their homes before the danger was immediate, and would reduce the period during which it would be necessary to maintain large garrisons to the time when an attack might be actually threatened. To these considerations of general application there are others which bear especially on the case presented by you. And without attempting to enter minutely into the discussion of the question, I will offer some of the more prominent views which seem to me to sustain the argument for the military value of the proposed road to which you invite my attention.

Its terminus on Lake Superior is a part of that frontier where we are confronted with our most powerful neighbor. The approach to it by land from the Mississippi river is long and difficult. The other mode of reaching it, that is to say, through the lakes and by the St. Mary's river, would, in the event of war with Great Britain, be too liable to interruption to constitute a safe dependence. Until, then, the country between Lake Superior and the Mississippi river shall be peopled and cultivated, the land route from that stream to the lake must be looked to for the transportation of troops, munitions, and supplies, and in this view the proposed railroad has much importance as an element of military strength. The numerous and warlike savages and half-breeds who inhabit that portion of the country will be probably under the influence of the Government which is probably nearest to them by its intercourse and means of approach, and therefore the communication which you propose would tend, in my opinion, to give to the United States the control of the Indians who would, if arrayed against us, be a serious embarrassment to the settlement of the country, and a formidable ally to an enemy, in the event of hostilities on that frontier. I herewith return the bill.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JEFF. DAVIS, Secretary of War.

Hon. W. H. BISSELL, House of Representatives.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio, obtained the floor.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will yield me the floor for a few moments.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will yield the floor for a moment, but I wish to say a few words about this bill.

Mr. LANE. I am not in the habit of troubling the House or the committee, but the first objection that I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] to urge is, that the course I have pursued is illiberal legislation. Now if I understood the other gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] the chairman of the Committee on Territories, one point he made was, that the construction of this road would cost the General Government nothing. Why not cost the General Government anything? Why, because it would increase the value of the land. Now, from my knowledge of the effects of the construction of railroads, the land lying at the termini of the road is most benefited by the construction of it. The land in and around the termini of the road is more benefited by the grant than the land lying along the line. Therefore is it not an interesting question as to whom this land belongs? I put it to each gentleman here; I put it to the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] whether it is not an interesting question? If it be true that the six thousand acres of the land upon the terminus at Lake Superior belongs to an individual, the Government is not to be so much benefited by the construction of this road as if it owned the land.

I made the statement here, and I repeat it, that I have been credibly informed by respectable gentlemen from the Territory of Minnesota, that this land is owned by individuals, or claimed by them, and that it has been sold or bartered in this city since the commencement of this session. I asked, and I think, courteously, of the Delegate from Minnesota [Mr. RICE] as to the facts: Have I been correctly informed? Does this land belong to individuals? Does it belong to the Indians, or does it belong to the General Government? It is a legitimate inquiry, if it would have the influence suggested upon this floor. Does that six thousand acres of land belong to the General Government? And I presume that the contrary would have its influence, that we ought not to legislate here to make wealthy men more wealthy.

But, again: The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] complains of me for the course which I have pursued in reference to this subject. All I have to say to him is this: I shall pursue my own course, without reference to the opinions of any man upon this floor. I am here representing as intelligent a constituency as any other member. I feel that I know their wants. I feel that I am much more able to represent them than a gentleman from any other portion of the country. I pursue my own course, responsible to them, and not to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. If he is dissatisfied with my course, I regret it; but he cannot undertake to dictate to me here the course which I shall pursue.

I have stated these facts plainly, and said to those interested that I have these names, and am ready to give them at the proper time, in my own opinion. I select the time and place, and no gentleman here can dictate to me the adoption of any other course.

I have said here, and I repeat it again, that I will resort to all honorable means to defeat every bill of this character—and why? Because I believe that in so doing I shall faithfully represent my constituents. No one here has the right, then, I think, to complain of the course which I have pursued. If I lacked courtesy to the honorable Delegate from Minnesota, he alone was interested. I submit it to the members of this body whether I did not courteously propound the questions which I did? I regret to say that they were not answered to my entire satisfaction.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I have a very few words to say upon this bill, Mr. Chairman. I have listened, with some attention, to the gentleman from Indiana, supposing that he would respond, and give the committee some information, if he had any, in regard to the rumor which he thinks should prejudice this measure.

I concur entirely with what was said by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL.] If this bill is to be prejudiced on mere rumor, I put it to this committee whether the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. RICE] did not respond, as far as he could, and give every information in his power. If he did not, then I must have misunderstood him; and I will give way now for any other information that is to be given. But I understood that gentleman to say, that the United States had not parted with its title to the lands at and around the terminus of this road. Is the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] prepared to say that it has, or that any man owns that land at the terminus, or along the route?

Mr. LANE. I say that that question has not been answered to my satisfaction.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then may I ask the gentleman from Indiana whether he can say that the United States has parted with its title to the terminus of that road, or that any man owns it? and who told him so?

Mr. LANE. I will answer that question by asking the gentleman from Ohio whether he can state, from information derived on this floor, that the land at and around this terminus now belongs to the United States Government?

Mr. TAYLOR. I am bound to believe that it does, from the statement made by the gentleman from Minnesota, notwithstanding the rumors mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LANE. I did not so understand it.

Mr. TAYLOR. And if the gentleman from Indiana knows anything to the contrary, I desire him to rise in his seat and state it; and I say to this committee, that whether there are five hundred, or a thousand, or fifteen hundred acres of land about the terminus of this road, owned by private gentlemen, that would not influence me to oppose this project.

Sir, I vote upon higher grounds. This bill stands upon the great principle which I advocated the other day—the principle of aiding the Western and the new States in the construction of railroads for great national, as well as for State and territorial purposes. I belong to that class of politicians who believe that the General Government has the power to construct works of internal improvement of a national character; and I look upon this project as one eminently of that character.

What is it, Mr. Chairman? If I understand it aright, it is proposed by this bill, which has passed the Senate, and which has undergone the supervision of the Military Committee of this House, and is now before us, to connect the great Lake Superior, the most beautiful inland sea on our continent, with the Mississippi river, “the Father of Waters,” by a line of railroad about two hundred and fifty miles long. It is a proposition to construct a railroad for military, postal, and other purposes. It is a great national project. Shall this great national object, which we are about to clothe the Territory of Minnesota with power to carry out, be disconcerted and destroyed on a mere rumor suggested by a gentleman in this House, the aim, or the object, or the substance of which he is unable to give us? I should say not, sir. If there be anything fraudulent in it, anything wrong; if there be fraud, speculations by private individuals connected with it, and if there be a gentleman on this floor who knows anything of them,

I trust he will state his knowledge, and state it here. Here is the place for publication. Let us have every rumor and statement prejudicial to this bill made here, on the floor of the House of Representatives, where they can be met. And if no gentleman has any information, such as should prejudice this bill before the House of Representatives, I trust this committee is too independent to have their minds swayed for a moment by an idle rumor of the day, no matter by whom it may have been originated.

I think this a very important bill. It is one to aid the infant Territory of Minnesota in constructing a railroad for the benefit of its citizens. It is of vast importance to the citizens of the whole country that Lake Superior should be connected by some means of communication with the Mississippi river.

The amount of land proposed by this bill is similar to that which we have granted by many other acts of Congress. The State of Missouri, which you, Mr. Chairman, in part so ably represent, had two grants of land for similar purposes; and grants of lands for railroads have been made to other sections of the Union. And shall I be asked by this committee to withhold my vote from a grant to Minnesota which would give to that Territory five hundred thousand out of the thirty millions of acres of public land which, as I understood the gentleman [Mr. RICE] to say, lie within her limits, and are owned by the United States within her borders? I look upon it as a great benefit to the United States to grant these alternate sections of land for such a purpose. How will that benefit the United States? In my judgment it will facilitate the settlement of that country—of that vast unsettled region—which is only waiting the action of Congress upon this bill to have its resources developed, and to induce an extensive and rapid settlement of the country, and to promote its cultivation. That is the great object which we should have in view in the disposition of all our public lands—to promote the settlement of the lands, and to encourage the labor of the country.

I have heard nothing against this bill, as yet, that can induce me to withhold my vote from it upon its passage. If I should hear anything further, either from the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANE], or from any one else, showing that a great fraud was being practiced upon the Government, I should feel authorized to withhold my vote. As yet I have heard nothing against the bill, but everything which recommends it to my favorable consideration.

Mr. HENN. I have just been informed, by a gentleman from Minnesota, that there is no land at the terminus of this road even surveyed. But an order has gone out for the survey of a portion of that country, but none of it is yet surveyed.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa whether he has any knowledge of any conflicting claim against the Government of the United States in reference to these lands?

Mr. HENN. The first I ever heard of the matter was this morning, when it was brought forward by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANE.]

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Mr. Chairman, as I have but just now come into the Hall, and as I have lost the former part of the discussion, and as I have never until this moment seen a copy of this bill, I may not know, with the necessary precision, what are the subject-matters of the discussion. But, with my present impressions, I am opposed to the bill. I am opposed to this bill, not because I am opposed to any existing railroad company that may be interested in the bill, nor because I doubt the worthiness of any company that may be organized to build it. I have no reason to apprehend that such a company would be composed of any other than honorable men. I have no reason to apprehend that such a company would not be moved to build the road by as pure and as generous a regard for the public welfare as ever prompted any, even the best railroad company. Nor am I opposed to this bill because of the possible fact that a company of gentlemen may be interested in a tract of land at one of the termini of the proposed road. Nor am I opposed to this bill because the proposed road may have the effect to concentrate trade and travel at this point, or to direct trade and travel from that point.

I am opposed to this bill because it calls for Government to do with the public lands what I hold Government has no right to do with them. I hold that they do not belong to Government, and that Government has nothing to do with them but to regulate and protect the occupations which shall be made upon them. I hold that the lands belong to the landless; and that both reason and religion, policy and principle, require that they shall be surrendered to the landless. But, as I had the opportunity, a week or two since, to discuss this point somewhat extensively on this floor, I will not consume the time of the committee with it any further, than to say, that when I claim the public lands for the landless, I mean not only the landless of a certain complexion, but all the landless. Believing, as I do, that all the varieties of the human family are equally dear to the great heart of their common maker, I trust that they will ever be equally dear to my little heart. So do I aim to bear myself toward all descriptions of my fellow-men—toward all my equal brothers—for every man is my equal brother—that, at the last day, I shall be able to look into the faces of them all, unabashed by the consciousness that I have pursued any of them in this life with unrelenting prejudice and merciless hatred.

But to the argument. And, now, for the sake of the argument, I will admit that the public lands are property in the hands of the Government—as much so as is money. Nevertheless, I still deny that Government may use them in the way contemplated by this bill. I insist that Government shall use its property for none other than strictly governmental purposes. It may use its property in defraying the expenses of Government; it may use it in affording protection to the persons and property of its subjects; but there is nothing else for which Government may use it.

In point of principle this bill is all the same, as would be a bill for the Federal Government to build with money, and nothing but money, the whole of a railroad in Minnesota. The principle cannot be affected by the fact that the road in this case is to be built with land instead of money; nor by the fact that the appropriation of land asked for is insufficient to pay the whole cost of the road. If the Government may build with land it may build with money. If it may furnish one half or one fourth of the means necessary to build the road, then it may furnish all. But would not Congress be startled by the grave proposition for the Federal Government to build the whole of a long railroad in Minnesota, and that, too, with money? It should not be, however, if it is reconciled to the passing of this bill.

What is the argument most relied on to influence Government to help build this road? It is that the road will accelerate the settlement of Minnesota and the development of her resources; and greatly enhance the value of the public lands in that Territory. I admit that this would be the effect, and I should rejoice in it; for I regard the welfare of that Territory with great interest. But this same effect, to a greater or less extent, could be produced by Government building canals in that Territory. May Government, therefore, build canals in it? Again, Government might promote these good objects by building churches and school-houses in the Territory. But nearly or quite all of us would condemn it as a gross perversion of its true office for Government to help Minnesota to school-houses and churches. And yet, so far as its right is concerned, Government can as well do these things for Minnesota as to build railroads for her; ay, and so far as its right is concerned, it can as well sprinkle Minnesota over with stores and blacksmith shops.

I intimated that I am not opposed to the building of the road in question, because of its possible rivalry with some other road. And yet, one reason why I am opposed to the granting of land in aid of the building of this and other railroads is, that Government may, in this wise, be throwing its great weight into the scale of one road against another; of one town against another; or of some other interest of one part of the people against the like interest of another part of the people. Government should avoid partiality, not only in the purpose of its acts, but, as far as possible, in the effect of its acts also. Government is bound to be strictly and sternly impartial. But such impartiality it will best maintain, and can only maintain, by refusing to extend special help to any classes or portions of its subjects; and by simply and equally protecting all.

I rejoice in the free and extended discussion of this bill, if it is only because I hope that we may come out of it with juster views of the nature of the office, and juster views of the limits of the province of civil government. It is high time that the American Congress had settled, with more distinctness and more certainty than it seems to have done, the legitimate boundaries and the legitimate objects of civil government. These boundaries and these objects thus settled, we should not hesitate as to the true disposition to make of this bill, and of all kindred bills. We should reject them all promptly.

But it is said that we have abundant precedents for such disposition of the public lands as is proposed in this bill. Arguments drawn from precedence are of doubtful value. An age of progress should rise above precedents—should make precedents for itself. Were we to rely on precedents, it might be urged against us that, inasmuch as there are more precedents for monarchies than for republics, we ought to supplant our Republic with a monarchy. In this disordered and misgoverned world there are far more precedents for the wrong and the false than for the right and the true. Shall we, therefore, give up the right and the true?

The Governments of the earth have ever proved great curses to the people, by meddling with the concerns of the people. It is time that we had ceased from following such precedents; and that we had left the people to do their own work; and, therefore, to build their own railroads without help from Government on the one hand, and without hindrance from it on the other. Such hindrance there may be in the case of one road, where Government helps build another, which may prove its rival.

This usurpation by Government of the work of the people, and its consequent neglect and bad performance of its own work, has everywhere, and in every age, been the sorest evil that the people have suffered. I would that we might teach, in the most emphatic and unmistakable language, that, so far as the influence of this body extends, the American Government shall henceforth confine itself to its only and one work of protecting the persons and property of its subjects, and shall leave the people to do their own work of building churches, and schools, and railroads, and canals.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. And forming their own governments.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Yes; and forming their own governments. That is right. The people should be allowed to form their own government.

To return. We have precedents for land monopoly, also. Poor Ireland, and, indeed, almost every other part of the world, furnishes us with numberless such precedents. But I hold that we should turn our backs upon such precedents, and throw open the public lands, without price, to the landless to whom they belong. I say that they belong to the landless. The bare fact that a man is without land is title enough to his needed share of the vacant land. No clearer, stronger title to it can he possibly have. Is there a spare home in the great common inheritance of the human family, who should have it if not the homeless? I repeat it, we should make the public lands free to the poor. If, on the contrary, we shall do with them as is proposed in this and similar bills, we shall make much of them cost to the poor double, and much of them even quadruple, the price that Government puts upon them.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman; but I feel it to be my duty to raise a question of order. Three days are set apart for the consideration of territorial business, and I submit that it is not in order for the gentleman from New York to discuss the homestead bill under the proposition now before us.

Mr. SMITH. I would say a word in reply to the gentleman, did I believe that there is any force or pertinence in what he has said.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois raises the question of order that the gentleman from New York is not confining his remarks to the discussion of the bill now under consideration. The Chair perceives that the gentleman is arguing that this grant of land shall not be made, and he believes that the gentleman from New York is in order.

Mr. SMITH. I ask no latitude, sir. I am willing you should hold me as strictly to the subject-matter as if I were discussing it in the House, and not in this committee. I have yet to learn (and I think I may add that they who know me have yet to learn) that I am addicted to wandering from the subject under discussion. From having long trained myself to the most careful confinement of myself to the subject in hand, I hope not to be found guilty of offending against my habit, and against confessed propriety in this respect. But, sir, I am aware that many gentlemen appear eager to speak on this occasion; and that there is not an hour, nor a half hour, for each of us. I will therefore bring my remarks to a close; I would be just and generous in my use of our common time.

It is said that railroads are necessary to enable the poor to get to the public lands. Admit it. Nevertheless, there will be railroads enough for this purpose without Government giving to the rich the lands that belong to the poor. The poor ask no such left-handed help as this from Government. The poor have no faith in the maxim, that if Government will take care of the rich, the rich will take care of the poor. In demanding the public lands of Government the poor demand only what belongs to the poor; and if Government will yield to this demand, the poor will either provide themselves with railroads, or they will make it the interest of others to provide them.

Mr. CAMPBELL addressed the committee in remarks maintaining the constitutionality and good policy of making such grants as provided in the bill. [His remarks, withheld for revision, will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, obtained the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield me the floor for a single moment?

Mr. BAYLY. Certainly, if I do not lose the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to say but one or two words to the committee. We have but three days set apart for this territorial business; and while I do not desire to stop the debate upon this bill until every gentleman who is opposed to it, and who may wish to do so, can be heard, if it were possible to do so, I think that it is important we should stop the debate so that we may either adopt or reject this bill, and then go to the consideration of the others. Some are important, and we desire to pass them. It is important, too, that we should pass them now. I desire to give notice at this time, that when the committee rises I shall move to limit the debate to some period to-morrow, so as to afford an opportunity for the discussion of the measure under consideration during the day.

Mr. BAYLY. I beg leave to say to my friend from Illinois that I had not the slightest expectation of speaking in this committee for the consideration of territorial business. I am impelled to do it only by the course of remark of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL.] I am free to say, in entire candor to this committee, that although I can go on now, I would prefer to delay my remarks until the morning. I have not the material with me now.

Mr. BRIDGES. I move, then, that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ORR. I desire to submit a few remarks on this bill. I can do so this evening, if it be agreeable to the committee.

Mr. BAYLY. If it be understood that I do not lose the floor, I should be glad to yield to the gentleman. I have been taken by surprise.

Mr. BRIDGES, by unanimous consent, withheld his motion that the committee do rise.

Mr. ORR. I do not propose to occupy more than five or ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can occupy the floor, and in the time of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BAYLY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ORR. Mr. Chairman, while I am in favor of the general principle of donating alternate sections of the public land for the purpose of constructing railroads, I am opposed to this bill. In the first place, I object to it because in the first lines of the first section it states the grounds and principles upon which the donation is made different from the true grounds upon which it has heretofore been and now ought to be placed. It is declared in the first section of the bill that for the purpose of facilitating the transportation of mails, men, and munitions of war there be and is hereby granted, &c. Now, sir, while I will not go into the argument as to the power of Congress to make the grant for such a purpose, I think the true ground to place the donation of lands for railroads in alternate sections upon is that of the proprietorship of this Government over the land, and that the donation as made is proper, as it will increase the value of the reserved sections.

If it be necessary that a road shall be constructed from these two points for military purposes, then, sir, I desire that a road may be constructed such as has been constructed in other Territories, and for similar purposes. I am not in favor of changing the practice of the Government by building railroads for military purposes now, when we have pursued the practice of building a common highway for such purposes for the last fifty years.

I do not believe, then, looking at this question in a military point of view, that a railroad is necessary to connect the two points indicated in the bill. There is only a remote probability that such a road, if built, would ever be used to transport a single soldier or munition of war. Neither troops, provisions, or munitions, are ever likely to be used by the Government along the line of this road. What is there in all this region of country which would invite the construction of such a road? There is a very sparse population along the line of the road, and in some localities there is no population to use a road or enjoy its facilities. There is very little commerce there, and I do not perceive the slightest necessity for its construction, for either military or commercial purposes. If it be desired to throw troops on Lake Superior, we have the facilities of navigation on Lake Superior.

At the last session of Congress we passed a bill granting to the State of Michigan five hundred thousand acres of land for the purpose of constructing a canal around the falls of Sault Ste. Marie, in order that the navigation between Lake Superior and Lake Michigan might be opened. This navigation between the lakes will be opened in a very short time, as that canal is in progress and approaches its completion; and if it be desired to throw troops or transport provisions or munitions of war in any direction in that region, you will have that means of communication.

Mr. RICHARDSON, (interrupting.) I stated, when I was up before, that the distance between St. Paul, on the Mississippi, and Lake Superior was a hundred and twenty miles. Now, in order to go by the route which the gentleman from South Carolina proposes, you would have to make a circuit of fifteen hundred miles to avail yourself of the benefit of the improvement which the Government has aided to construct. The route would be down the Mississippi river to Galena, then across to Chicago, and then by the lakes—which would be a very circuitous route.

Mr. ORR. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether there is any necessity for the communication between Saint Paul on the Mississippi and Lake Superior? How many troops will pass over that route? How many barrels of pork and flour will be transported between these two points? What exigency can arise, that will make it necessary to concentrate troops at the head of Lake Michigan, and if it should arise; where is there any probability that the troops would have to come from the direction of St. Paul? Is not the whole of the Lake Superior and Lake Michigan shores a fine grain-growing region? Is not the country on the Mississippi all along down by St. Paul also a grain-growing region? If it is desired to supply the troops at St. Paul, you can supply them from the Mississippi farms. If it is desired to supply the troops at Lake Superior, you can furnish them from the productions along the two lake shores. Why, then, is it necessary to provide this means of transportation? And is the remotely contingent necessity such as to justify the Government in donating alternate sections to build a railroad merely to accommodate troops and transmit mails?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state to the gentleman from South Carolina why the construction of this road is necessary. I understand that the land along the lake shore, Lake Superior, is valuable for its minerals. And I will state to him now that my understanding is, that at that point flour is now worth $40 a barrel. They cannot get a barrel of flour there at all at this season of the year; and the only means by which they could get there at all would be by connecting this road with the Illinois road.

Mr. ORR. What do you want to make the connection for? What is the necessity of the connection in a military point of view?

Mr. RICHARDSON. We want to make it for the purpose of transporting troops there, and for transporting provisions for them. The Indians have possession of the country in the Territory of Minnesota immediately on the lake. You have to keep a military station there. You have not extinguished the Indian title there. It is true, the Indian title over in Wisconsin has been extinguished. You have kept a station there for furnishing supplies to these Indians, under the stipulations of the contract made with them; and there is a constant necessity of passing from St. Paul to the Mississippi and the lakes.

Mr. ORR. I do not see that the answer of my friend from Illinois varies the question at all. I cannot conceive the necessity of having troops upon Lake Superior, because there are trading houses and Indian agencies there; nor do I perceive the connection between troops and mineral lands. If you want to supply the miners with provisions over a railroad from St. Paul, say so in the bill; but do not represent that the construction of the road is needed for military purposes, if that is the use it is to be appropriated to. If troops are stationed there, they have already all necessary facilities furnished by that broad sheet of water, Lake Superior, washing fertile shores, and connected through Sault Ste. Marie with all the agricultural West. But whether that is so or not, I am not in favor of building railroads for the purpose of providing for the transportation of men and munitions of war. It is far enough for this Government to go to construct common roads.

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. ORR. I am myself occupying the floor by the courtesy of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY.]

Mr. BISSELL. I merely wish to say that the propriety of granting aid to the building of these roads is not solely or principally on account of their necessity in a military point of view.

Mr. ORR. Then the bill does not describe truly the purposes for which it is designed.

Mr. BISSELL. What the framers of the bill may have thrown in by way of preamble, or by way of recital, does not, I think, become a substantial part of the bill. I do not think they weigh anything against the bill. The framers may have thought it strengthened it, but I do not. I do regard the road as likely to become, in the future, very important in a military point of view. But it is not solely or principally on account of its military necessity that I favor it. If there is no use for the road, then, of course, it will never be built; for men will not expend time and money in building a road, when there is as little necessity for it as the gentleman seems to think.

Mr. ORR. The gentleman says if there is no necessity for the road it will not be built. True; but when the bill passes, the Legislature makes its selections; the remaining sections are increased in value to $250—some of the land may be sold at that price; and when the road is abandoned, what confusion will not ensue? Ought we not, upon the principle of granting lands to enhance the value of the balance, to be satisfied that the road is practicable and necessary, and that it will be built, avoiding the loss to the citizen and confusion to the Government which would ensue?

Under the provisions of this bill, alternate sections on both sides of the road, for twenty miles, may be disposed of by the Legislature of Minnesota. But what provision is there for the accounting for that money? Suppose they take the money and do not appropriate it to this purpose, what recourse have you?

But another objection to this bill is this: I believe a portion of this road runs through the Indian territory, the title to which is not yet extinguished. The upper terminus of this road, I think, is in the Indian country. But of one thing I am confident, and that is, whether the Indian title is extinguished or not, the larger portion of this land has not been even surveyed by the Government; and your action would render a survey imperative, in anticipation of the wants of the people, and before the President shall deem it expedient, for the sole purpose of enabling the Minnesota Legislature to select the land you donate. But you propose to grant alternate sections along the whole length of the road, a distance of three hundred miles.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Two hundred miles.

Mr. ORR. I think if my friend from Illinois, will make an admeasurement upon the map from the starting point on Lake Superior, by the way of St. Paul, to the southern boundary of Minnesota, and from thence to the terminus of the Illinois Central road, he will find that the distance is more than two hundred miles.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is two hundred and sixty or seventy miles. But the grant is only to the southern boundary of Minnesota.

Mr. ORR. The grant, Mr. Chairman, goes further than that, if I read the bill correctly. The bill provides that this road shall be extended down to the southern boundary of Minnesota, "with the privilege of extending the road to the northern terminus of the Illinois Central railroad upon the Mississippi." If any gentleman will just refer to the map, he will find that the point first indicated as the stopping point is a distance of eighty miles, more or less, short of the terminus of the Illinois Central road. They have the power, under the provisions of this bill, to extend the road from Lake Superior to the terminus of the Illinois road.

In every aspect of the case, I do not think that this bill should pass, although I favor the principle. I oppose it upon the ground of expediency. I do not believe that it is politic to make these donations to Territories at all. I think that when donations are made, that they should be made to the States themselves. There is more of stability, and conservatism, and responsibility in State governments than in mere territorial governments. If the principle set forth in the first section of this bill be true, then this Government should build this road in the Territory of Minnesota. If it is for national purposes exclusively—if it is for the convenience, safety, and accommodation of this Government that such a road should be constructed, let this Government do it. The Government has no just right to ask the people of Minnesota to aid in its construction, or to require the territorial government to supervise it, if it is for military purposes. But if it is for the purpose of giving to the people of Minnesota alternate sections of the public lands to build a railroad for their convenience, then in no shape ought it to be passed from such considerations of expediency as I have suggested. I did intend to extend my remarks upon this subject further; but I have trespassed too long already upon the time of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY.] With his permission, I move that the committee rise.

The question was then upon Mr. ORR's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly sundry territorial bills.

The SPEAKER, (Mr. ORR temporarily occupying the chair.) The question first is upon ordering to be engrossed and read the third time the bill "for the construction of certain roads in the Territory of New Mexico."

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time; and having been engrossed, was read the third time; and

The question being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MEACHAM. I move that the House adjourn.

A. BOYD HAMILTON.

Mr. HAVEN. I appeal to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEACHAM] to withdraw his motion for a moment, to enable me to make a motion to reconsider a vote that was taken yesterday, that may be of some consequence to the House. I wish to make the motion now, so that it may be entered upon the Journal.

I move to reconsider the vote taken yesterday, by which the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RUSSELL] in behalf of the Committee on Printing, in reference to auditing and settling the accounts of A. Boyd Hamilton, was adopted. I believe that some question has been raised as to the propriety of some of the provisions of that resolution. It has been suggested that it ought, at least, to be considered by the House; and I therefore make the motion, and ask that it may go upon the Journal. I now yield the floor, in accordance with my promise to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MEACHAM.]

Mr. MEACHAM. I renew the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HENN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion, to enable us to adopt a resolution closing debate upon the bill now under consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Several MEMBERS. That can be done to-morrow morning.

The question was put, and the motion agreed to; and

At half-past three o'clock, the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. FISH presented two memorials of citizens of New York, praying the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of the Faculty of Columbia College, New York, praying that a township of land may be granted to each chartered college and university in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented a memorial of citizens of Newark, New Jersey, praying that measures may be taken to secure religious liberty to American citizens residing or traveling in foreign countries; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives in Congress, to use their efforts to procure an appropriation of $200,000 for the improvement of the navigation and the protection of the harbors along the seaboard of that State, from the point of Sandy Hook to Cape May; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CASS presented a memorial of citizens of New York, praying that measures may be taken to secure religious liberty to American citizens residing or traveling in foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, presented two petitions of citizens of Wisconsin, praying the establishment of a tri-weekly mail from Fort Atkinson to Stoughton, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. SLIDELL, it was Ordered, That the memorial of John Ervin be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, for the purpose of being presented in the House of Representatives.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That Orson Young have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. WELLER, it was Ordered, That John A. Bryan have leave to withdraw his petition and papers, for the purpose of presentation in the House of Representatives.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill to authorize the issuance of patents to lands in Louisiana in certain cases, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred resolutions passed at a meeting of the soldiers of the last war with Great Britain, held at Baltimore the 17th of February, 1854, in relation to their pay, pensions, and bounty land asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHIELDS asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill granting a portion of the public lands to the State of Iowa, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAY asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill granting to the State of Alabama public lands in alternate sections to aid in the construction of a central railroad from some point on the boundary line of the States of Alabama and Tennessee to a point on the boundary line of the States of Alabama and Florida; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SLIDELL asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill to confirm the claim of John Ervin to a certain tract of land in the Bastrop grant; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

THE SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill for the relief of the United States troops who were sufferers by the recent disaster to the steamship San Francisco, submitted a report, recommending the Senate to recede from its amendment which was disagreed to by the House, and to strike out the word "four," in the tenth line of the first section, and insert "eight."

The amendment of the Senate disagreed to by the House, which the Committee of Conference recommend the Senate to recede from, is:

"Provided, That the amount of pay and allowances advanced the officers and men by the authority of the President, previous to their embarkation, shall be passed to their credit, and their receipts for the same be canceled."

The effect of striking out "four" and inserting "eight," as recommended by the committee, is to allow to each officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, who embarked on the steamship San Francisco, a sum equal in amount to his pay and allowance for eight months.

The report was concurred in.

ARMY RETIRED LIST.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to promote the efficiency of the Army by retiring disabled officers.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Department have agreed to some verbal corrections of the bill, which are embodied in the copy which I now hold in my hand. I therefore move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the following:

That if any commissioned officer of the Army shall have become incapable of performing the duties of his office, he shall, as provided in the second section of this act, be placed upon a retired list, and withdrawn from active service and command, with the pay proper of the highest rank held by him at the time, whether by staff or regimental commission, and the service rations to which he may then be entitled, but without any other allowances; and the officer next in rank shall be promoted to the place of the retired officer, according to the heretofore established rule of the service. And the same rule of promotion shall be applied successively to the vacancies consequent on the retirement of an officer, as herein provided: Provided, That if the disability result from wounds received in action, the pay proper of the retired officer shall be that of his highest rank by brevet or otherwise.

Sec. 2. And he further enacted, That, to carry out the provisions of this act, whenever any officer of the Army may, who may be incapacitated, as heretofore recited, shall voluntarily apply to be retired from active service, or on being ordered to perform the duties appropriate to his commission shall report himself unable to comply with such order, or, whenever, in the judgment of the President of the United States, an officer of the Army shall have become in any way incapacitated from performing the duties of his office, the President, at his discretion, shall direct the Secretary of War to refer the case of such officer to an Army Board, to be composed of not more than nine nor less than five commissioned officers, to be detailed from those of superior rank to him whose case is under consideration, as far as his grade and the interest of the service will permit. And the said board shall determine upon the case referred to them, and their opinion thereon, with a record of the proceedings, shall be transmitted to the Secretary of War, to be laid before the President for his approval or disapproval. If, in the judgment of the board, the officer be considered incapacitated for active service, the board will report whether, in their opinion, the disability is to be traced to vicious habits. If otherwise, and the President approve of such judgment, the disabled officer shall thereupon be placed upon the list of retired officers, according to the provisions of this act; but if the board are of opinion that the disability was the result of vicious habits, and the President concur in that opinion, then the disabled officer shall not be placed on the retired list, but shall be dropped from the rolls of the Army.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President shall deem it advisable to cause an officer, who has been withdrawn from active service, and retired from the line of promotion, as herein provided, to be placed on any duty not incompatible with his condition, such officer shall, for the time he may be so employed, be entitled to all the pay and allowances of the grade with which he was retired from service.

The amendment was agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

A. BOYD HAMILTON.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution from the House for settling the accounts of A. Boyd Hamilton, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I ask for its consideration at this time.

Mr. ADAMS. I would suggest to the Senator that a motion has been made in the House to reconsider the vote on the passage of that resolution.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will state to my friend from Mississippi what the resolution proposes. In 1852 there was an arrangement made in relation to the settlement of printing accounts, and the mode of printing was changed. There were then certain claims of A. Boyd Hamilton for printing, which he asked to have allowed. It was provided that the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and the Clerk of the Committee on Printing, should adjudicate those claims and pay them. They never have yet been adjudicated upon, and there is now no clerk of the Committee on Printing. Although the committee have authority to appoint a clerk, not needing one, no appointment has been made; and therefore the board, which, by the original law, was authorized to settle these claims, has no existence. This joint resolution proposes simply to transfer the duty required by law of the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House, and the clerk of the Printing Committee, to the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. WALKER. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine if this resolution proposes to establish any rule than that by which they were to be governed?

Mr. HAMLIN. None at all.

Mr. WALKER. They are to be governed by his contract?

Mr. HAMLIN. They are governed by the law as it passed. The claims are to be adjudicated upon in precisely the same way that they would have been settled by the board if it was now in existence.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

It proposes to direct that in place of the party named for settling the accounts of A. Boyd Hamilton, in the seventeenth section of the act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853, and for other purposes, there be substituted the First Comptroller of the Treasury, and to charge him with their duties as specified in the act; and further, that the accounts of Mr. Hamilton be settled as prescribed in that section, and that the amount which may be found due to him shall be paid upon the certificate of the Comptroller.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

SOLAR COMPASS.

Mr. STUART. There has been here pending for some days a bill which was called up formerly at my suggestion, and which I should like to have acted upon now. It is a bill to authorize the United States to use the solar compass in the public surveys.

Mr. FOOT. If I mistake not, that bill is upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. STUART. That is a question. I called it up on a former day, and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] objected to it because it was not a private bill.

Mr. FOOT. Is it not on the Private Calendar?

Mr. STUART. There is no separate Calendar printed of private bills. On private bill day the Senator from Delaware objected to it, because it was not a private bill. It has been called up since, and the Senate adjourned while it was under consideration. I should like to have it disposed of.

Mr. FOOT. I will make one more appeal to the Senator from Michigan to allow me to call up the indigent insane bill, which is upon its passage. I desire to make one more effort to get a vote upon it.

Mr. STUART. I do not wish to interpose any objection to the consideration of the bill to which the Senator alludes; but he will recollect that it has been, for several days, in court here, and has not been finished. But I will yield to him.

Mr. FOOT. They have been very short days only parts of days, and the bill has given way for other business.

INDIGENT INSANE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill making a grant of land to the several States and Territories of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons, the question being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. ADAMS. Before the vote is taken on the passage of the bill, I propose very briefly to answer the questions propounded by my colleague [Mr. Brown] yesterday. I shall consume as little time as possible, for I know it is desired that the question should be taken.

My colleague, in the remarks which he made upon the subject, inquired of me upon what principle could the Federal Government give lands to a State in which the lands lie, and refuse to give them for similar purposes to the States in which they do not lie. The difference between my colleague and myself is this: What he calls gifts or gratuities I consider as the payment of debts, granted for a consideration. My colleague says that I introduced a bill, at the present session, to grant alternate sections of the public lands to aid in the construction of railroads in our State. True, sir, I did so, and upon his motion the bill passed this body; but not as a gratuity, rather as an act of justice to that State for the improved value of the reserved sections.

In regard to the lands granted to the State of Mississippi, I agree with him that all the States of the Union have a common and equal interest in the public lands; but while they have that equal interest in those lands, and an equal claim to have the Treasury restored to the entire expense of their acquisition, yet, when that is done, and you come to dispose of the surplus or profits, I do not consider that the old States have an equal claim with the new States, for reasons which have been given time and again here, and the considerations which have controlled the action of Congress in the very cases referred to.

First, in reference to the granting of school lands to the State of Mississippi: When she presented her constitution, and asked for admission into the Union, a compact was made between her and the Federal Government, by which it was agreed that not only should the public lands belonging to the latter be exempt from taxation while it retained the title to them, but that the purchasers under it should be free from taxation for five years after their purchases—for what purpose? As an inducement to individuals to purchase lands. They were to have their land free from taxation for that time, which they would not have if they bought land from other individuals.

In consideration of this, it was agreed that five per cent. of the proceeds of the land should be given to the State, three per cent. of which should be appropriated for improvements on roads and canals, making valuable the remaining and unsold land. And every sixteenth section was appropriated for common school purposes. Was that a grant? It was a grant, it is true; but was it a gift? No, sir, it was a grant for a consideration, as an inducement for persons to purchase the land surrounding these sixteenth sections, and to pay their money for them. Just as well might you say that an owner of town lots, who lays off streets and common as an easement for purchasers of lots to induce them to pay for the lots, makes a gift. It was for a consideration.

Again: my colleague says that five hundred thousand acres of land were given for purposes of internal improvement. This comes in the same category, and under the same rule. These five hundred thousand acres were to be appropriated to internal improvements in the State; but for what purpose? For the benefit of the State alone? No, sir. The public lands had been offered for sale, and all which were worth the price which the Government was willing to take for them had been sold, and the money had been paid for them into the Treasury. But, as an inducement for the sale of the balance of the lands that were not worth anything without the labor and effort of citizens of the States, these new States were granted these five hundred thousand acres. They were to be appropriated to purposes of internal improvement, just as a prudent landholder would have done with his own lands. If they had belonged to an individual he would have done the same thing. Therefore that grant was not only for a good consideration, but a valuable consideration, to be appropriated for internal improvements within the State in order to make the unsalable lands salable, and as some compensation to citizens who had gone into the wilderness and reclaimed valueless lands, and being compelled, by your refusing to put the lands at their intrinsic value, to pay, when the lands adjoined those of an individual, two or three times their value; and millions have been paid in this way over and above the intrinsic value of the lands. This was another portion of the consideration. It was not a gratuity. It was founded upon a good and valuable consideration.

Then my colleague says that a million of acres of swamp lands were given to the State of Mississippi. Those lands were mere overflowed lands; they belonged to the Federal Government. They were not worth one cent a thousand acres, and never would have been while they belonged to the Federal Government. Then, as a prudent landholder, the Government said to Arkansas and Mississippi, and other States, these lands are valueless; we have no right to reclaim them; make them valuable, and you may have them. Was there no consideration here? The Government looked forward to the consideration, I admit, that when the State should reclaim these lands, and they should be cultivated, they would bring in, by their vast productions, immense amounts into the Treasury. Therefore it was a valuable consideration.

But in the grant of the five hundred thousand acres, I wish to call attention to the view taken of it by the State which we have the honor to represent on this floor. That State consented to receive that five hundred thousand acres of land, and yet, when you proposed to give her her distributive portion of the public revenue in the Treasury, she refused, and has to this day refused, to receive one dollar of it. She received the five hundred thousand acres because she considered herself entitled to it, not as a gratuity, but on account of the benefit which the Federal Government derived from the money paid into the Treasury for the lands which were sold, and for the improving of the remaining lands.

But my colleague says I am mistaken in supposing that the Federal Government has not, on any occasion, distributed the lands within the States to the citizens of the other States, or to other States, for the reason that bounty lands have been given to soldiers of the late war, and that many of those soldiers resided in New York and other States which contain no public lands. I do not consider this a gift. I consider it the payment of a debt; and there is the distinction, the difference between my colleague and myself. I consider that it was the payment, not of a legal, binding debt, according to a contract, but of an equitable and just demand which was owing by the people of the United States, or by the Federal Government to the soldiers; and this fund, being a fund belonging to the United States, was the legitimate fund out of which to pay it. I recollect very well—I happened to be a member of the House—that at the time war was declared with Mexico, a proposition was made in that House to increase the pay of the volunteers from seven to eight dollars a month, if I recollect correctly. It was refused. Why? Not because seven dollars a month was a fair compensation for the services to be rendered. By no means. It was admitted and agreed upon all hands that the Government never could make full compensation for the sacrifices of its soldiers. It was not known how long the war would last, but there was a common understanding, as those who were members of the House at the time can bear testimony, although nothing formal was done to that effect, that if the war lasted any considerable length of time, in addition to the seven dollars per month, bounty land would be granted, not as a gratuity, but as compensation for the services of the soldiers. Do you consider, when a man leaves his home and business, and served in Mexico six, twelve, or eighteen months, at seven dollars a month, and you make him a grant of one hundred and sixty acres in addition to the seven dollars a month, that you are making him a gratuity? No, sir; you are paying a debt of high moral obligation; an obligation which, although not strictly legal, is entirely equitable. When you grant the widow and orphan children, whose husband and father fell upon the battle-field, and shed his blood in defense of the rights of his country, one hundred and sixty acres for the loss of their husband and father, do you call that a gratuity? No, sir, it is the payment of a debt; and so in every solitary instance, according to my humble judgment, the Federal Government never has granted, nor has it any right to grant, by way of a mere gratuity for the citizens of any State, any amount of money out of the Federal Treasury.

It is said, however, if this be done, why not provide for the destitute and insane of the different States? The cases are altogether different. One is the case where individuals have rendered service to the Federal Government, and all are equally bound to pay them; the other is where the Federal Government has no jurisdiction whatever, and there is no connection between them and the Federal Government. That is the distinction I draw, and it is one of the reasons, among others, why I cannot vote for the bill. I have other reasons, but I will not consume the time of the Senate further by giving them.

Mr. STUART. I am not disposed to enter into any discussion of this bill. I submitted a few remarks on the subject the other day. I wish, however, to propose an amendment.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator permit me to say a few words in reply to my colleague?

Mr. STUART. That can be done when the amendment has been proposed. This bill, in all its substantial provisions, was very carefully considered by the Committee on Public Lands. There is language in it, however, which was contained in what may be called the old bill, which is not proper. The attention of the members of the committee has been called to it again, and also the attention of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. FOOT,] one of the members of the committee; and it is agreed that it may be amended, which can be done by unanimous consent, in the second section, 4th, 5th, and 6th lines.

The bill, as it now stands, is:

"And whenever there are public lands in a State worth $1 25 per acre, the value of said lands to be determined by the Governor of said State, the quantity to which said State shall be entitled shall be selected from such lands," &c.

The intention of the committee was to allow the States in which lands lie, subject to entry at $1 25 per acre, to select the lands within that State. I propose, therefore, to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make an amendment, by striking out the word "worth," and the words "the value of said lands to be determined by the Governor of said State," and inserting in place of the word "worth" the words "subject to sale;" so that the clause will read:

"And whenever there are public lands in a State, subject to sale at $1 25 per acre, the quantity to which said State shall be entitled shall be selected from such lands," &c.

That will give uniformity. The language, as it now stands, might allow the Governor of one State to determine one standard, and the Governor of another State another standard. I think there will be no objection to the amendment; it is precisely what the committee intended.

Mr. FOOT. I hope the amendment will be agreed to by unanimous consent. It is proper. It makes it what was intended.

Mr. ADAMS. I object to it. I would rather have the bill as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WALKER in the chair.) The Senator from Mississippi objects; the amendment, therefore, cannot be made.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to say, before the debate progresses further, for the purpose of avoiding any mistake or misapprehension, that I have not meant, as the drift of my colleague's remarks this morning would seem to indicate him to understand me as meaning, that I object, in any degree, to the grants of lands which have been made to States heretofore for school purposes, internal improvements, or as bounty lands. I think they are all right and proper.

Mr. ADAMS. If my colleague will allow me, I will state that I did not misunderstand him. I was only showing the difference between those grants and this one. I understood him to say that he thought them all right.

Mr. BROWN. I introduced them simply for the purpose of showing that the Government has heretofore exercised the power of giving away the lands.

Mr. STUART. I am very sorry, sir, that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Adams] makes objection to this amendment. I hope he will review his decision. It is a matter in which I believe the Senate very generally concur; and it seems to me that difficulties, practical difficulties, will occur unless it is made. I do not wish to resort to a motion to recommit the bill, but I certainly, with my views of propriety, shall be obliged to do so for this purpose, unless the amendment can be made by unanimous consent. I suggest, if the Senator's objection arises from his opposition to the amendment itself, that he should give his consent that the amendment may be offered, and the sense of the Senate taken upon it.

Mr. ADAMS. I am willing to consent to that. I will not object to having the question taken upon the amendment, so as to let the majority of the Senate determine upon it.

Mr. STUART. The Senator will then consent to let the amendment be proposed, and have the sense of the Senate taken upon it. By unanimous consent that can be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, that will be done; the question will be put upon the amendment.

Mr. BADGER. That certainly, under the rules of the Senate, cannot be done, if objection is made to the amendment.

Mr. STUART. Unanimous consent is given to take the sense of the Senate upon it.

Mr. BADGER. But that is not unanimous consent to the amendment. If the honorable Senator from Mississippi wishes to embarrass the bill on account of a technical amendment, he can do so.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not wish to do that. I do not object to having the sense of the Senate taken upon it. I prefer the bill as it stands, and I am not willing to give my individual consent to it; but I am willing to give my consent to have a vote upon it.

Mr. FOOT. If I understand the rule, it is this: An amendment is offered which requires the unanimous consent of the Senate. The question being stated to the Senate, if no one interposes an objection, the amendment is considered to be incorporated into the bill and adopted; and no objection being made, I suppose the amendment is adopted.

Mr. RUSK. It seems to me very clear that we cannot amend the bill on the third reading. That is the rule. But unanimous consent of the Senate can dispense with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi adhere to his objection?

Mr. ADAMS. I will not object to the reception of the amendment on account of its not being in order. I will give my consent to have it brought into the Senate, and then I shall ask a vote upon it, because I am not in favor of the amendment itself.

Mr. STUART. That is all that is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Chair will put the question upon the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Mr. President, I do not rise to delay a vote upon this bill, or to interpose any obstacle to its passage. It is due to its dignified and courteous author [Mr. FOOT] that I, at least, should afford him every opportunity to bring the Senate to a decision upon a measure in which he feels so much interest. He is a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and has extended to the business of my State every consideration and favor which I have asked for it. I was in a minority in the committee which reported this bill, the only member of that committee who was not in favor of it. The details of the bill have been well considered, and I think are in quite as good a shape as those of any similar measure which has been presented to the Senate. My objections go to the principles upon which it rests. I dissent from all the reasons which have been urged by the Senators who have spoken in advocacy of this measure. I regard it as "distribution" in a worse shape than any that was ever devised or presented to the nation. I would greatly prefer the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] which looks directly to the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States of the Union, and directly from its National Treasury. That has, what is a very great recommendation to me, the merit at least of boldness. It neither disguises nor covers up anything, nor does it attempt to dictate to sovereign States what they shall do with the means which are placed at their disposal.

Being unwilling to take up the time of the Senate, and as I know my friend from Vermont is exceedingly anxious to obtain a vote upon his bill, I will content myself with saying that I sympathize most cordially with the views expressed by the two Senators from Virginia, in opposition to this measure, and those so ably and zealously enforced against it by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. ADAMS,] who sits on this side of the Chamber. With these Senators I concur in thinking that it is highly inexpedient to distribute the lands or their proceeds among the States. When once begun I cannot see where it is to end. Objects calculated to excite our sympathy will be constantly presented, and will be enforced as this has been, by strong appeals to all the more humane and generous feelings of our nature. When once the States, and societies and communities within their borders, begin to taste of this Treasury pap, I fear that their appetites will be whetted and increased by that upon which they will have fed. The great evil in all of our legislation, and it is the evil of the times, is excess. This National Government of ours was made to conduct the foreign affairs of the confederated States, and to perform certain other general functions looking to peace and war, commerce, and other great matters which could not be managed by the States in their separate capacity. Let it not then depart from the purposes for which it was formed, and commence the work of establishing eleemosynary institutions within the borders of sovereign States, if it even be for the praiseworthy object of benefiting the indigent insane.

It is not within the legitimate sphere for which this Government was formed; and having no power to enforce or carry out the objects which it is indirectly undertaking by this bill, its purposes and wishes will be disregarded and set at naught. Funds going as these will, to be scrambled for in the State Legislatures, rarely accomplish much good. They are dealt with very differently from those which are raised by a direct tax upon the people, for whose benefit the expenditure is to be made. Sir, the times are most inauspicious to a wise, proper, and economical administration of our public affairs; and one of the unfavorable symptoms which meet us on every side, in my humble judgment, is the large majority by which I know this measure is destined to pass. To get rid of the insuperable objection to one sovereign State, as such, holding large bodies of land within another, the bill provides that the distributive share of each shall be received in land scrip, so called; which she is allowed to peddle in the market, but not locate in her own name, and, in my opinion, is a giant stride toward what is termed land monopoly, than which nothing could entail upon the people among whom it exists a greater curse. Ten millions of scrip, or bank paper in another form, is to be thrown into the market as soon as it can be issued under the provisions of this bill. This scrip will be bought up by speculators, who will go with it by the cord or bale to the new States and Territories, and enter the lands along the lines of our contemplated railroads, and in all desirable localities. Its practical operation will be seriously to diminish to the struggling poor the benefits of a homestead, which, I trust in God, Congress will grant them at its present session. There is no aspect in which I can view its operation which does not appear to me most prejudicial to the best interests of the Government and people.

I differ entirely from those who think that this measure rests upon the principles which govern Congress in making certain grants of land to the new States, or that members from those States are called upon in the exercise of a fair liberality towards the old States to vote for this measure. The sixteenth section, and other grants made to the new States, were offered as inducements to your citizens to encounter the hardships, privations, and dangers incident to the settlement of your distant, valueless and savage territory. Some of the grants to the new States slightly squint towards compensating them for a forced surrender, at the time of their admission, of the almost unalienable right to tax the property of the great landlord, who has thus far done little more than to receive and carry off the last dollar of our citizens for land priced at $1 25 per acre, which, but for the labor and toil of those citizens who settled upon and improved it, would never have been sold for six and a quarter cents the acre.

But, sir, I know that a majority of the Senate are favorable to the bill, and I will not delay its passage. I know what I have said is unwelcome to its friends, and especially to the worthy Senator from Vermont, whose patience and urbanity all have witnessed during the somewhat protracted discussion upon this bill.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted—yeas 25, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Brown, Chase, Clayton, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Everett, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Houston, Jones of Tennessee, Morton, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Wade, and Walker—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Butler, Cass, Clay, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Fitzpatrick, Mason, Pettit, Welles, and Williams—12.

So the bill was passed.

On the motion of Mr. FOOT, the title of the bill was amended by striking out the words "and Territories."

VERMONT SENATORSHIP.

The Senate, on motion by Mr. PETTIT, resumed the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, affirming the right of the Hon. SAMUEL S. PHELPS to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. PHELPS addressed the Senate at length in continuation of his remarks of 3d February, in defense of his right to hold his seat. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. FOOT. I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. FOOT, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. STRATTON obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 13th ultimo, transmitting a copy of the circular addressed by the Secretary of the Treasury to persons engaged in manufacturing and commercial pursuits, soliciting their views upon the best mode of adjusting the tariff, so as to bring it within the revenue standard, together with the replies received from all such persons, with various letters and documents thereby elicited, numbered from one to fifty inclusive; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STRATTON, by unanimous consent, presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use their efforts to procure an appropriation by Congress of $200,000 for the improvement of the navigation and the protection of the harbors along the seaboard from Sandy Hook to Cape May; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I have a report to make of a territorial bill, which I presume is in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. The report will be received.

CLERKS FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. STANTON. Before the bill is read I ask the permission of the House to enable me to offer a resolution, which is rendered necessary by the investigation required to be made by the Committee on the Judiciary, by resolution of the day before yesterday.

The resolution I desire to offer is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to employ a clerk, whose compensation shall be the same as that of the clerks employed by other standing committees.

I will merely say that, in the judgment of the committee, the investigation which was ordered the day before yesterday, with reference to the Gardiner claim, renders it absolutely necessary that we should have the services of a clerk. That is all I have to say.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. The Select Committee, of which I have the honor to be chairman, on the subject of military superintendence of civil works, have instructed one of their members to make the same request on behalf of that committee.

Mr. FAULKNER. I was instructed to make that request, and this is the resolution which I desire to offer:

Resolved, That the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the propriety of military superintendence over civil works be authorized to employ a clerk, at a compensation not to exceed four dollars per day.

I would simply remark to the House, that it will be utterly impossible for the select committee to make the investigation with which they have been charged—to send for persons and papers, and examine witnesses—without this assistance. I therefore offer my resolution as an amendment to the resolution of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to have the first resolution read over again.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. LETCHER. I understand that that resolution is offered in consequence of the duty imposed on the committee for investigating the Gardiner fraud. I hope, therefore, that a proviso will be annexed to the resolution, that when that investigation is concluded, the clerk shall be dismissed.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I have no objection to that modification.

The SPEAKER. Then the modification will be made.

The question was then taken on Mr. FAULKNER's amendment; and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the resolution as amended.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Is it in order now to amend the original resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. LANE. At the request of the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, I move so to amend the resolution as to authorize that committee to employ a clerk.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. This resolution was introduced by the unanimous consent of the House, and must be disposed of. The objection to it comes too late.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I move the previous question.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANE.]

The question was put, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COBB. I endeavored to get the floor to object to the introduction of the resolution in the first place. The Gardiner proposition has not as yet been fairly acted upon. I now move to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question was taken, and the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table; there being, on a division, only nine votes in the affirmative.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

SALARIES IN OREGON.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I have been instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report and recommend the passage of "A bill to increase the salaries of executive and judiciary officers in Oregon and New Mexico," with two amendments. I am not disposed to make any motion in reference to it. If the Delegates from those Territories who are interested in its passage choose to let it go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I shall not make the slightest objection. If it go to that committee it will be taken up and considered within the three territorial days, I presume.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES IN OREGON.

Mr. SMYTH, of Texas, from the Committee on Territories, to which was referred "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to settle and adjust the expenses of the people of Oregon in defending themselves from attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians, in 1847 and 1848,' approved August 21, 1852," reported the same back with a substitute therefor; which, with the bill, was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

PAYMENTS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill without amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass, for the payment of the civil officers employed in the Territory of New Mexico while under military government; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

THE MINNESOTA LAND BILL.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to terminate all debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Minnesota land bill within one hour after the committee shall have resumed the consideration of the subject.

Mr. KERR. I hope that motion will not prevail. Let the gentleman from Illinois make it two hours.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Very well; let it be so. Then I move that the debate close within two hours after it has been resumed.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that the motion made by the chairman of the Committee on Territories ought to prevail. Three days have been set apart for the consideration of territorial business. One day has been already consumed in the discussion of this bill; and if debate be not stopped, the question will be discussed for the next two days, and not a bill relating to any other Territory will be touched.

I ask the House, therefore, that debate on the Minnesota land bill be stopped within two hours after its consideration shall have been resumed, so that the committee may have an opportunity of considering other bills; or else that the House may set apart some other day for their consideration.

Mr. HENN. I move to amend the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] by striking out the words "two hours," and inserting "one hour;" and on that I ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—75 members rising—and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and, on a division, there were—53 in the affirmative.

Tellers were demanded, but were not ordered.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question was then put upon the adoption of the resolution; and it was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the passage of the following bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered:

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am very desirous to get along with the business before the committee, and I therefore move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was put; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being business relating to the organized Territories.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, they had under consideration Senate bill No. 38, entitled "An act to aid the Territory of Minnesota in the construction of a railroad for military, postal, and other purposes;" and upon that subject the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, said he should not have opened his lips but for the position taken by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] who had taken to task the Virginia delegation generally and himself particularly, and had charged on them, that in voting to cede to certain States the swamp and overflowed lands within their limits, and in voting to give lands to the soldiers who served in our different wars, they have conceded to the Congress of the United States the full authority to dispose of the public lands in any manner which their unrestrained discretion may seem to point out.

The Constitution confers on Congress authority to make all needful rules and regulations in respect to the territory and other property of the United States. However, he utterly denied that the Constitution confers on Congress, under that clause, the unlimited control of the subject, for the Federal Government is but the trustee in regard to the disposition of those lands. The public lands of the United States, whether acquired by cession, by purchase, or by conquest, are held by the General Government in trust. In the case of cession, the trust is given in the deeds of cession; in the case of purchase or conquest, the trust results from the character of the transaction; and in the latter two cases, no less certain than in the first; in each case, whether by grant, where the trust is defined in the deed, by conquest, or by purchase, where the trust is a resulting one, it redounds to the common benefit of the whole. Therefore, while he admitted the power of the General Government to make all needful rules and regulations concerning the public lands, they are bound to do it in subordination of the trust. They have no right to make them in disregard of the disposition of the trust.

Gentlemen, therefore, when they come here and show that Congress has power to make all needful rules and regulations concerning the public lands, do not advance one inch unless they show the grant to the Territories and States for railroads is in pursuance of the trust.

But why was it that he and his colleagues voted to give away the swamp lands, and also bounties to soldiers? On the first point he said, among other things, the swamp lands were utterly useless and unfit for cultivation; and, worse than this, they were a nuisance, impairing the value of other public lands in the vicinity. In this condition of affairs, the question presented was this: Will we undertake to make those swamp lands valuable, reclaiming them by ditching and other means; or will we allow others to do so, and thus, in the latter case, benefiting the Government, which is the trustee of all the public lands?

As to giving bounty lands to soldiers, he claimed that this was done under the war power, not under the constitutional clause giving Congress power to make all needful rules and regulations concerning the territory of the United States. He maintained that Congress has the right to reward soldiers for faithful service in defending the soil which we own; and that to encourage them in this way, by giving them something substantial—land—was better than voting them money.

He made further remarks on these and kindred subjects until the expiration of his hour, replying to Mr. CAMPBELL's views relative to grants of land for railroad purposes. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. KERR did not agree either with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] who addressed the committee yesterday afternoon, or with the honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] who had just concluded his remarks.

He differed, in toto calo, from the gentleman from Virginia, if he correctly understood the position he had assumed. He [Mr. K.] believed in the power of the Government to make appropriations, either of money or of lands, for works of internal improvement. He believed that the Government had the right, if it chose to exercise it, to appropriate the revenue collected from any and all quarters for such works of internal improvement as it might deem calculated to develop the resources of the country, and strengthen the bonds of our Union, or promote the general prosperity. In his opinion, the Government has the right to donate these lands to railroad companies, to States, literary institutions, or to any other parties, when, in the judgment of Congress, such grants would be the means of promoting the general prosperity of the country. All this power on the part of Congress, he at once conceded. He had always maintained it; he belonged to a party in this country that had ever insisted upon it. Moreover, they had not only insisted on this power, but had maintained the right of Congress to exercise it; and many years ago their great leader, the illustrious statesman of Kentucky, whose genius was manifested by many of the best and noblest works of internal improvements that had ever been established in the country, proposed a plan for the management and disposition of the public domain, which, had it been acquiesced in, would have prevented the wasteful disposition which had since been made of them.

Mr. Clay proposed to distribute these lands among the various States of the Confederacy, according to their Federal population, giving to the new States in which they were situated fifteen per centum upon the amounts derived from their sale. The party to which he belonged insisted upon this system years ago; but they were met by statesmen from Virginia with the constitutional objection that Congress had no right so to dispose of the public lands. His party predicted then that unless these lands should be thus disposed of they would not be retained by the Government for the purpose of raising revenue therefrom, as it was insisted they should be by the Democratic party; and the prediction then made—that the West would at some day have the power in Congress to take these lands—has been verified. The West now possess this power, and the country witnessed the spectacle of a gross abuse of the trust reposed in Congress, as he conceived it; not, however, a violation of the Constitution, for he did not maintain that position, believing Congress had the power to give these lands away.

He [Mr. K.] contended that there was a gross violation of trust involved in the policy for some time past pursued on this question. Whence did they derive these lands? Had they not been told, here and elsewhere, again and again, that a large portion of them was given by the States of Virginia, North Carolina, New York, and others—a common offering for a common good—the payment of the debt incurred in that struggle which resulted in establishing the liberty we now enjoy. These lands were acquired by the common treasure, and it was, therefore, the common property.

The Government was but the trustee for the benefit of all the States; and if, in distributing these lands, discriminations were made, manifest injustice, gross wrong, would be done those States to whose prejudice such discriminations were made. They who lived in the South, or in any other portion of the Union in which public lands did not exist, were as much entitled to a fair share of this common property as those who resided in those States in which such lands were situated.

While he maintained this doctrine, he was by no means disposed to take the position that no grants of land should, under any circumstances, be made to the new States for railroads, education, and other purposes. On the contrary, whenever he could see manifested here a purpose to do justice to his section of the country, to do justice to the old States, he would go with the most ardent advocate of these schemes for internal improvement in the West, if they should be sustained by sound reasons.

Mr. K. then opposed the bill before the committee, believing it was based upon the petition of a single individual, and that there was no company organized to build the road therein provided for.

Mr. K. concluded by giving notice that he would at the proper time move to amend the second section of the bill, by adding the following:

Provided however, That the money received from the sales of the reserved sections shall be paid over to those States who have received no grants of public lands for internal improvements, according to their Federal representation in Congress.

[Mr. KERR's speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I have reflected considerably on this bill, more, perhaps, than I have on any which has been before us, with the exception perhaps of one, I mean the great absorbing one of the day, and I have come to the conclusion that I ought to vote for it. I have listened to the argument presented here by the very learned and respected gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] as I always do when he speaks, with respectful attention, but it has failed to convince me.

I wish to bring the attention of the committee to this subject under two points of view. In the first place, the question of constitutionality, which is so common here; and secondly, the expediency of it. If I recollect correctly, and if not, the gentleman from Virginia can correct me; the very first report which was made in this body years ago, in favor of the power of this Government constitutionally to construct internal improvements, came from a chairman of the committee, who was a Virginian.

Let us look at the constitutional question a moment. There are three grounds upon which different speakers have placed the subject of the constitutionality of these grants. Inasmuch as the power of Congress is deemed so very important a question, and continually pressing upon us, and involving, as it does, the entire policy of our Government in respect to the settlement of the great western domain, it seems to me proper that we should have some distinct ideas on the subject, and, if possible, to have something clear and decided, and not be disputing about first principles continually year after year. The first position taken by gentlemen on the other side of the question, that it is constitutional for this Government to make internal improvements, is derived from the power expressly given in the Constitution authorizing this Government to regulate commerce among the States.

It was said by our great advocates of the system of internal improvement by the National Government, that the power to regulate commerce included something more than passing revenue laws. It implies power over the instruments of commerce, that is to say, it includes the power to construct and improve harbors, canals, and even railroads. Provided, however, that such constructions or improvements have two essential requisites. They must first be strictly national in their objects; or they must at least concern more than one State; or, in other words, as Chief Justice Marshall expresses it, "they must be instruments of commerce" intermingled with "the States."

Then there must be another requisite to constitutionally vest this power in the Government; and that is, the work provided for must be an improvement which individuals or private companies cannot accomplish, such a work as must be done by the Government, or not done at all; otherwise it is not properly a governmental measure anywhere, but a mere private enterprise, such as no Government, with or without our Constitution, would have a right to perform. It must be some channel or instrument of commerce, and more; it must be, besides that, a national work, and one which individuals cannot well do. It must concern more States than one. Then the constitutional power of the National Government is very clear, if the Supreme Court is right in ruling that this power to regulate commerce includes the power to regulate the instruments of commerce, even to the running of railroad cars, and to steamboats, and other things of that nature.

But, Mr. Chairman, the case presented by the bill before us is not one of those cases. I need not go any further than to say that in regard to that doctrine I espouse it to some extent, where the case is made out to be clearly national in its object, and where the work cannot be done by individuals within a reasonable possibility. In this case the nation ought to make the improvement; and if it would not do it, it is not fit to be a nation.

Then, sir, the next power is one which I see the President of the United States has pretty successfully stated in his message. That is: This Government, as a proprietor of land, may make improvements, or may assist in making improvements by making grants of land, provided they come within the true policy of a proprietor of a large tract of land, seeking for the best price. Edward Livingston, who owned a large tract of land in my county, gave away certain lots for the sake of the improvements upon them, which made the other land so much more valuable. We may do the same; but in regard to this, we must be sure of two things in order to make that measure constitutional; we must be certain that this increased value of the remaining lands will be fully equal to the value of the land given away; and not only equal to their value when they come to be raised or enhanced in price by time and the general growth of the country, but equal to them before their advancement in that way, and irrespective of the general growth of the country. We must be certain that the enhanced value of the other lands reserved arises from such improvements, and not from the general growth of the country. A widow is entitled to her dower in land which her husband has alienated in his lifetime. She takes it at the value it was when he alienated it, exclusive of subsequent improvements; but she has a right also to the enhanced value arising from the general progress and settlement of the country around, and not put on by the alienee.

And so it should be with us. I think, therefore, that some of the arguments offered here, to show that the country has grown greatly in such cases, and that, on the whole, the remaining lands are equal in value to that granted away, are not precisely to the purpose; because the whole nation is entitled to that gradual growth in the value of land arising from the growing immigration and settlement of the country; and because the enhanced value of the remaining land must be a value which closely and necessarily grows out of these very improvements, and would not, in any state of the case, arise without them. But, sir, under this power, given in the Constitution, founded on proprietorship, it is not necessary that the improvements which we aid should be national ones—they may be merely local; and probably for this reason, among others, it will be found that this power, suggested by the President in his message, is the most latitudinarian in degree, and most dangerous to be exercised of any heretofore claimed.

But, sir, there is another constitutional ground upon which I choose to place the case before us. The idea is not original with me, but I took it from a learned speech in the Senate the other day, made by a Senator from Virginia, where he quoted the decision of the Supreme Court, and argued very learnedly to prove the reverse of my construction of the views of Judge Marshall. The position is this: that the Legislature, when it legislates for a Territory, acts in a double capacity. It acts as a Federal Legislature, with the authority of trusteeship over the public domain, if you please, bound in equity to give to each State its just Federal proportion of its avails. Then it acts, in this case before us, as a Territorial Legislature. In exercising its powers as a Territorial Legislature, Congress has, in addition to its Federal powers, the general legislative power of a State. In fact it is the mere guardian of a State in its minority. It is the guardian of Minnesota, now about sixteen years old.

But Congress, in its character of guardian, has not absolute, despotic power. All the restrictions on States in the Constitution apply to us when acting as a State. In doing anything for Minnesota now we are restricted by just exactly the restrictions as those by which the Minnesota Legislature would be if she were a sovereign State, admitted into the Union, and we, sitting in Congress, were to give her her proportion of the public domain, or some of it. We are not now giving to Minnesota her full portion. We keep an account current with her, as we do with all the States. We propose to give her a proper proportion at a proper time, reserving to all the States their fair proportions. We give to her Legislature the right to make these roads, and to dispose of these lands now, only as part of her share in the inheritance. If, then, this bill is so framed as to give to the Legislature of Minnesota only a fair proportion of the public domain, we ought at least so to secure and guard it that she will not return upon us when she becomes of age, and say that we, as her guardian, permitted her to fool them away; as Indiana has complained for the loss of a township given her for a college.

Now, sir, I come to the question of expediency, for I am sure that this doctrine is the one which will ultimately prevail with the people in respect to our constitutional powers. The gentleman on my left [Mr. KERR] admits that the practice of the Government is such that he does not expect to get it back again. Then why whistle against the wind? Why not take things as they are? It is better to have a future than a past, and go with the operations of nature and laws of Providence, that by any unreal or fanciful doctrines of our own, however perfect we may prove them in theory. We have, sir, exclusive legislative power over the Territories; but not so exclusive as to justify us in exercising a despotic Government over them; we are to impose constitutional restrictions, and no other, and to grant them their rights, and nothing more.

We should apply Minnesota's portion of the public domain to her own use in just such a way as a guardian would apply money for the benefit of his ward under his charge. It does not follow, I admit, that because we have the power we should squander these lands. It does seem to me that, viewing the subject as a question of expediency, it is not unwise policy to make the grant of lands asked for in this case. The proposition is to make a railroad from Lake Superior—the great American Mediterranean—to connect with the waters of the Mississippi. The location of this road cannot be mistaken; and the Legislature of Minnesota, I have no doubt, if admitted as a State, would make the same location. I think the location is a very judicious and proper one, and that there will be no trouble about it whatever. But will the road ever be worth anything? It connects the great Lake Superior with the Mississippi river, and the interior with the Atlantic. We know that in the neighborhood of Lake Superior the mineral resources are very great, and are now beginning to be developed.

I cannot avoid saying one thing to my friends from Virginia. They go for the South and southern interests, and they are right; I should pursue the same course probably if I were a southern man. They do not object to drawing upon the Treasury for means wherewith to buy more southern territory from Mexico and Texas, where they find everything congenial with their institutions, and sympathies, and habits. Why not let us of the North do the same thing? The Territory of Minnesota is to be settled chiefly by Yankees. Although I do not mean to make war upon my friends from the South, yet I cannot help remembering, the very first day I took my seat upon this floor, the remarks made by a gentleman from South Carolina, in reference to the Erie difficulties. He said that we of the North must expect such trouble—intimating that we had a great middling interest always disagreeing and disunited, but that they of the South were easily agreed and united. But such evils are overbalanced by vastly greater advantages, and that is true. But let that pass. All I desire is, that these western lands of Minnesota should be occupied by our hardy yeomanry of the North, who can cultivate and improve them. It is not enough only to cultivate the land; they must cultivate and be cultivated themselves. We read that man was made to cultivate the earth, but we know the earth was made to cultivate him. A people can only be made intelligent, virtuous, free, and independent where the country is such as to require the exercise of all our faculties, and to demand all the various operations of industry. I have submitted, sir, all the remarks I intended to make.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I propose to detain the committee for a few moments only upon the bill under consideration. Personal explanations are always painful and hateful to me, and I would not detain the committee for any such purpose, did I not feel it incumbent upon me as a duty. In the explanation I have to make, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the following paragraph contained in the speech made by the gentleman from Illinois on yesterday:

"I suspect the time the gentleman would desire to give this information would be after the defeat of this bill."

Now, sir, my friendship for that gentleman is of no ordinary character. It was cemented by encountering the same hardships and meeting the same dangers; and I cannot be induced to say anything offensive to that gentleman; but I must be permitted to remark, without intending it unkindly, that I envy not the man who entertains, much less expresses, such a suspicion of any gentleman in this House, and particularly when that gentleman is a friend.

My object yesterday in refusing to give the name of my informant, was an object which every gentleman would have in view; a principle of courtesy by which every gentleman would be controlled. And what was it? That I might see my informant, intending, the moment I did see him, to give to the gentleman from Illinois, and to the committee, his name. I repeat, and submit it to every gentleman upon this floor, if it was not due from me to my informant that I should see him and acquaint him that I proposed to give his name? When he made his communication to me, as recited by me yesterday, I presumed, and he presumed, that the fact would never be mentioned in this House. And let me say, that I courteously inquired of the Delegate from Minnesota, merely to ascertain the situation of the lands at the terminus and along the line of this road. I had no other object in view than to ascertain whether this rumor which I had heard was true. Certainly there was nothing improper in that; and certainly, because I chose not to make the name of this gentleman public, until I had his authority for so doing, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] does me great injustice in entertaining or expressing such a suspicion. I send to the Clerk's desk the following communications, which I ask to be read.

The following letters were then read by the Clerk:

WASHINGTON CITY, March 8, 1854.

SIR: In a conversation had with you several days since, you informed me that a gentleman in this city held a claim upon six thousand acres of land, at the Lake Superior terminus of the proposed railroad from St. Paul to Lake Superior, and that he had disposed of one fourth of said claim in this city. Please state upon what authority you made that communication to me.

Respectfully,

J. H. LANE.

Captain JAMES TILTON, Civil Engineer, United States Surveyors, Washington City.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 8, 1854.

DEAR SIR: I discover I was mistaken in regard to the location of the claim for land. It is situated twenty miles from the terminus of the proposed road.

Also, in regard to the sale of one fourth of the claim, or other purchases to be made by a gentleman now in this city. These are entirely prospective, and contingent upon future events, as the lands in the vicinity of the proposed terminus at Lake Superior are held now by miner's titles or flats, which will be either confirmed or annulled when the land surveys extend over that region.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. TILTON.

To Colonel J. H. LANE, M. C., Washington.

Mr. LANE, (resuming.) I gave notice here that I would oppose this and all kindred measures; not that I was opposed to granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad in Minnesota in particular, but that I was opposed to all measures of the sort, except the proposed grant for the construction of the great Pacific road, which is to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific.

This question was made an issue in the canvass that resulted in sending me here. The homestead policy and the antagonistical policy of granting lands to incorporate companies, were in issue before the people during that canvass, and the people, in sustaining me for a seat upon this floor, voted in favor of the former and against the latter. I voted, on the day before yesterday, with great pleasure, for the homestead bill; and now, in opposing this and all similar bills, I am discharging my duty to those who sent me here, and faithfully representing their opinions, as I understand them. Why do they entertain that opinion? Why is it that these grants to railroad companies are antagonistical to the homestead policy? By such grants you say to the homeless and the landless, "you shall not come upon the line of these roads." Now, my first lesson in Democracy was, that we should legislate for the whole people, and not exclusively for the rich and well born. The doctrine of legislating for the rich, and trusting to them to take care of the poor, has always been opposed by me, and by the party to which I belong.

Entertaining, as I do, the opinion that the homestead bill, if passed, will result more beneficially to this country than any measure that has ever been adopted, I would not restrict its operation in the slightest degree. That bill will settle up the new States; its effect will be to increase the price of the cultivated lands in the new States by removing from competition the neighboring lands now for sale at $1 25 per acre; and it will result in relieving the public Treasury from the expense of governing and maintaining the Territories, as they will at an early day be settled by the laboring men of the country, and, under the operations of that bill, come into the Union as States. That bill will settle the country; and railroads will follow that settlement, where they are needed by the people.

But there is another objection which I have, and which my constituents have, to these bills. We in Indiana know something about the danger incident to combinations of this sort. I do not charge gentlemen with acting in concert by agreement; but I do say that community of interests makes combinations here that are dangerous to the country. We in Indiana, by combinations of this sort, passing bill after bill for the construction of railroads, canals, and turnpikes, and the friends of each proposition rallying to the support of all, were bankrupt, and were left without one single work completed, in debt thirteen millions of dollars. Under the operations of this log-rolling system our people were induced to commence simultaneously works of internal improvement that would have cost fifty millions of dollars to complete. The system failed; the bubble burst, and the people of Indiana are now, in the shape of taxes, paying for the folly of their legislators who adopted this log-rolling policy. If I had no other objection to this policy I should object to the combination incident to the introduction of so many propositions of a similar character.

I am made to say, in the report of yesterday's proceedings, as follows:

"I may say to the Delegate that there is a large amount of lands, say six thousand acres, held by persons now here, perhaps upon this floor."

I did not intend to say, nor did I say, "perhaps upon this floor." I have been requested by gentlemen upon this floor—the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. EASTMAN] among the number—to state where I derived this information. I have stated it; and I desire to say that I know Captain Tilton, and a more gallant and courteous gentleman is not to be found. He is a friend of this bill. In conversing with him on the subject of this projected road, I asked him the situation of the lands lying along the route. He made the communication recited by me yesterday. He ascertained that he was mistaken; and although I am opposed to this bill, yet I would not withhold one single iota of testimony or information that would tend to remove prejudice from the mind of any member of this body, or elsewhere. I have had the notes read, first, in justice to myself, and secondly, that the projectors, or the friends of this bill, may have the advantage of the correction made by Captain Tilton.

Mr. BISSELL. To whatever extent I may have wronged the gentleman from Indiana, to that extent I am most willing to make honorable amends, not only on account of the pleasant and friendly relations of the past, but because it would be right. In our discussion yesterday on a bill in which a great many members of this body took great interest, and upon which it was thought quite possible that a vote might be taken before the adjournment, the gentleman from Indiana declared that an individual, or individuals were owners of a large tract of land at one of the termini of the proposed road.

Mr. LANE. That I had been so informed.

Mr. BISSELL. I meant to say that. He said that he had been so informed by a person of such credibility as to give it, in his mind, the impress of truth, or words to that effect. It evidently produced what I think it ought not to have done if strictly correct, an impression upon the committee adverse to the bill. What had the friends of the bill to do under such circumstances, except to ask for that information which would enable them, if there were any error in it, to expose that error, and thus do away with any unfair and unjust prejudice raised against the bill in consequence of the statement? Was it not right to ask for that? The gentleman from Indiana was asked if he had the information in his power. He said he had. We said, "Give it to us." Of course my meaning being, so far as I had anything to do with it, that we might treat of it, and that we might, if it were true, let it go before the House for what it was worth; if it were not true, then let us come here and show it, so that the bill might not be damaged by an unjust suspicion—the gentleman admitting that he had it in his power to give the information on the spot.

So while there was a probability—as I said before—or, at least, a possibility that a vote would be taken on the bill within two hours' time, I ask was it very unreasonable in me to say—and I put it to the gentleman from Indiana himself, and perhaps it was, though I do not see it—was it very unreasonable in me to say that I suspected the gentleman would prefer to give the name of his informant after the bill would have passed? That is what I said; and that is what the gentleman complains of. Now, Mr. Chairman, I repeat, that, to my own mind, it does not appear that in saying so I was out of the way. Nevertheless, if it seems so to my honorable friend, I am sorry that I made the remarks, for I would not, needlessly or wantonly, wound the feelings of any gentleman here; and I would be as far from suspecting the gentleman from Indiana of anything unfair as any other gentleman in the House. But in time of debate, and while a little excitement exists, everybody knows how things go in this House.

Allow me to say another word on this subject. May I not claim a little credit, at least, for what I said? for that itself has brought out the gentleman [Mr. LANE] on the floor this morning in a considerable refutation of the facts which were previously mentioned here by himself. If I had not said that which he now complains of there might be many members of this House laboring under the impression that what the gentleman had stated was correct, and thus the bill might have been unfairly injured. But the remark which I made to him—that of which he complains—had the effect of inducing him to do just what I intended he should do; that is, come here this morning, finding his statement incorrect, and make a correct statement of the fact, and thus do away with the erroneous impression his remarks yesterday might have caused.

Mr. LANE. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to interrupt him with an explanation?

Mr. BISSELL. Of course; with great pleasure.

Mr. LANE. I expected, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, that after the adjournment of the House some gentleman interested in the bill would drop me a line, asking me for the name of my informant. I intended, on the receipt of that note, to go to my informant—my friend—a gentleman of standing and respectability—a man of gallantry—and submit this note to him, and say to him, "I want your permission to give you as the author of this information."

Mr. BISSELL. (interrupting.) Well, Mr. Chairman, it is a mere difference of opinion between us as to the proper manner of doing particular kinds of business. I thought that if he could make so free, from the conversation he had with his friend, as to come here and publish it as a fact, with a view to make weight against an important bill about to be voted upon in the House, he ought to have no hesitation in giving his informant's name; or, at least, in furnishing us with some other clue to ascertain the correctness of the statement.

Mr. LANE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him again? It seems to me but just to say, that in the outset I merely inquired of the Delegate from Minnesota as to these facts; and that the other remarks were drawn from me by other observations made in the House. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt of the will, of the intentions, of the honorable gentleman from Illinois. I am not disposed to complain of him, and so there need not be a word more said on the subject.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the House (No. 17) for settling the account of A. Boyd Hamilton, without amendment.]

Also, that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles:

S. No. 44. An act making a grant of public lands to the several States of the Union, for the benefit of indigent insane persons.

S. No. 137. An act to incorporate the proprietors of the Glenwood cemetery.

S. No. 256. An act for the relief of the West Feliciana railroad, and the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company.

In which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill of the House (No. 135) for the relief of the United States troops which were sufferers by the recent disaster to the steamship San Francisco.]

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to say a word or two, but not anything in regard to the merits of this bill. That has been pretty fully discussed. I wish to leave that matter to the good sense of this committee; but I desire to notice some remarks which fell from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] in relation to the history of Indiana. I entertain for her some feelings of pride; and I make my remarks in vindication of the truth of history. I know the gentleman would not misrepresent her history, if his recollection was right; but he is not quite as old as I am, and does not recollect all the incidents of her history as well as myself.

He has notified us that he is opposed to the bill, and all others having in view the appropriation of lands for railroads. That is all right, as far as he is concerned. He has a right to vote against this and all other like bills; but if he will look back to the history of that State, he will find that when she was plunged into debt this Government stepped forward and relieved her by the most liberal donation of land ever made to any State of this Union. When she had undertaken a system of internal improvement upon her own credit, and had crippled herself, and was upon the point of repudiating her debts, she was enabled to place herself right by a liberal grant of land from the General Government to enable her to complete her works.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] is right in voting against this bill, if, as he tells us, his constituents are opposed to this kind of legislation; and whenever the constituents of any gentleman upon this floor are opposed to any measure he ought to vote against it. But these Territories, which are very remote from you, are dependent. They have a thin population, and no vote upon this floor. Their interests are in the hands of the Congress of the United States. They can ask for what is right, and it is for you to consider what is due them, and to do for them accordingly. I have no doubt of the justness and propriety of this bill, and believe that you will do much towards promoting the interests of that country, and in settling it, and enable her thereby a year or two sooner to come into the Union to take her stand among the States, not only to have a voice, and the right of talking upon this floor, but a vote also. There is room enough off of the railroad lines to enable everybody who desires to avail himself of the provisions of the homestead bill; and when they do so their interest will be greatly promoted by the establishment of railways through the country, as a means of enabling them to obtain access to a market for their produce.

In reference to the necessity of these roads for military purposes, about which the gentleman from Virginia has been speaking to-day, I would say that military posts are necessary in that country, although there is no danger of any foreign power invading the country. But it is not only necessary for military purposes—as posts must be kept up for the protection of the frontiers—but it is necessary for the conveniences of the country. Large grants of land have been made to the States, but none larger than to the State which the gentleman himself in part represents.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I desire to propound one question to the gentleman. I stated that combinations, under a log rolling system, had bankrupted Indiana. I understood the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LANE] to say that the grant of land from the General Government had relieved Indiana from bankruptcy. I desire to ask the Delegate from Oregon whether the grant to which he refers was not made to the State of Indiana long before that time, for the construction of the longest canal in the United States, and whether we were not compelled, by the great bankruptcy thus produced, to part with that entire work? Was not the gentleman himself a distinguished actor in the deed of cession? And would that cession have been made had prudence and wisdom controlled our legislators?

Mr. LANE, of Oregon, (resuming.) It is very true that, many years ago, I think it was in 1827, Congress granted to the State of Indiana, a large tract of land for making a canal from Lake Erie to the Wabash. That canal was made by means of this grant. After that was done we entered upon a general system of internal improvements, pledging the faith of the State for that purpose; and it was proposed to extend that canal the whole length of the State to the Ohio river. We went into all manner of railroad projects; and plighting the faith of the State, we borrowed a large sum of money, and expended it without making any works, and then fell back upon this Government for aid to carry them through. By means of a liberal grant of land from the Government, the State was finally enabled to make arrangements with her bond-holders and her creditors, by which she has completed a portion of her works; and she is now in as prosperous a condition as any State in the Union. The day is not far distant, I think, when she will have more facilities in the way of communication, more roads, and stand in a better condition, than almost any other State.

I only desired to say that the grant now under consideration ought to be made, and I think that my friend from Indiana, in my judgment—although I would not persuade him from his own course—ought to come up and vote for this Minnesota bill, and be willing to extend to that Territory the blessings which the Government extended to Indiana when I was a resident of that State.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I have a warm heart for Minnesota.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is not my purpose to undertake to reply to the various remarks that have been submitted by gentlemen in relation to this bill. The debate has taken a very wide range, and gentlemen have discussed not only the propriety of the particular bill under consideration, but a great many other things irrelevant thereto. I do not propose to pursue them in all their wanderings, but to consider at once the question practically before the committee.

I stated in the outset that the proposition under consideration was to grant lands to Minnesota inside of the Territory alone. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] thinks if we make the terminus upon the lake that we will have to go into the Indian country. The whole distance which this road will have to pass in Wisconsin, as I am informed by gentlemen who live in that State, is probably fifteen or twenty miles. I have prepared amendments to the bill, which I intend to submit without going into the discussion of the merits of the bill at all, for I desire to get a vote upon it immediately, that we may pass upon it, and be ready to consider the other territorial bills, which ought to be considered and passed. I have no doubt that every gentleman upon the floor has made up his mind how he will vote upon this bill.

The first amendment I propose is to strike from the first section in the bill the words: "for facilitating the transportation of the mails, men, munitions, and for other purposes;" so as to make it read "that there be, and hereby is, granted to the Territory of Minnesota," &c.

The next amendment which I shall propose is one of much importance, because it relieves the bill from the quibble which may be raised in reference to it. It is to add in the tenth line, after the word "lands," the words "in the said Territory of Minnesota," so as to confine the donation exclusively to the lands inside the Territory.

These are the amendments which I propose to offer to the bill; and I think I may call upon every gentleman of the House, whether he is opposed to the bill or in favor of it, to cast his vote without further discussion. If gentlemen cannot approve the provisions of the bill let them vote against it. All I ask is, that they shall not delay the time of the House by the discussion of questions that are not pertinent to the bill. Let us dispose of it in some way or other, so that we may proceed to the consideration of other business. I think I have the right to ask it. It is not unreasonable to do so. I do ask gentlemen to take the vote upon the bill without further discussion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Will my colleague permit me to say one word before he yields the floor?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURNE. I feel an exceedingly great interest in the measure which the committee is now considering. It is a bill of vast importance to the section of country which I have the honor to represent on this floor, and my constituents look to its passage with very great solicitude.

There was one thing in the bill that has attracted my attention. I refer to that provision which refers to the privilege of extending the road through the State of Iowa to a given point on the Mississippi river. But I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Territories in the House, [Mr. RICHARDSON], who I know to be a good lawyer; and I understood from the chairman of the Territorial Committee in the Senate, [Mr. DOUGLAS], who is a distinguished lawyer and judge, that this extension was not intended to, and does not carry, any land with it, but was only inserted to show the direction that it was to take; that it was not intended to grant any land whatever outside of the territorial limits of Minnesota. However, whatever may have been the true construction of the language granting the privilege to extend the road outside the boundary of the Territory, the amendment just proposed by my colleague, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. RICHARDSON], settles the matter, if, indeed, there had been any doubt on the subject before.

If the bill had provided expressly for a grant of land in Iowa, I should have desired to offer an amendment, if I could have done so without endangering the passage of the bill. But as any amendment by a friend of the bill might tend to embarrass it, and as it was the road I wanted, I determined not to move any minor amendments, even though I might consider such amendments important.

I will suggest the reasons why I should have desired the amendment to which I have alluded, if my friend and colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] had not proposed the alteration of the bill, and if the construction which I have just stated had been offered as the true legal one. There are two great lines of railroad which will run across the State of Illinois from Chicago to Galena and the Mississippi river. If a road be built under this grant, it will be a feeder to one or both of these roads. These two roads run through my district; and my amendment (had I offered it) would have been so to have changed the bill that there should be two termini, one connecting with the Illinois Central, at Dunleith, Illinois, and the other at the mouth of the valley of the Ute de Mort, connecting with the Chicago and St. Charles Air-Line railroad. Thus giving two outlets; doing justice to all interests, and injuring none. But the amendment proposed by the chairman, and even the bill without any amendment, according to the construction given to it, makes no grant of land to Iowa. The road will now terminate at the southern boundary of Minnesota. Private enterprise will build roads to connect with it; and the company which first builds a road to that point will get the benefit which its enterprise deserves.

Being, Mr. Chairman, in favor of the principle of these railroad grants, and particularly in the application of the principle to the construction of this particular road, opening up an intercourse with the enterprising and hardy pioneers of that magnificent Territory, I hope to see the bill reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass. We have had an able and temperate discussion upon its merits, and I trust the committee is satisfied of the justice of the measure.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not propose to submit any further remarks upon this subject. I do not desire to consume the time of the committee. I think the bill is as well understood now as it would be after two or three days of further discussion. The propositions involved in it are all plain and simple.

I will say to my colleague [Mr. WASHBURNE] that I do not desire to cheat anybody, or to be cheated myself. I have said all along that this grant is to be confined to the Territory of Minnesota. That is what I mean; and the amendment which I have proposed will remove all possible doubt.

Mr. WASHBURNE. As I said to my colleague, I am satisfied with his suggestion, and do not intend to move any amendment to the bill, if it is left precisely as it now stands.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the adoption of the amendment which has been submitted by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON.]

Mr. ORR. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield me a portion of his time?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. ORR. I desire to say that if the amendment suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Territories should be agreed to by the committee, it will remove the greatest objection that I urged yesterday evening to the passage of the bill.

I still, myself, doubt the propriety of making donations to a Territory; but if the principle is correct, I shall not feel myself called upon to make any serious opposition to it. It was in consequence of a new feature being introduced here that I felt called upon, yesterday evening, to make the remarks that I did in opposition to the bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Mississippi. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question, with his permission.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. HARRIS. Has any company been chartered for the construction of this road?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There has not been.

Mr. HARRIS. Then it is a mere blind grant to the Territory.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Having nothing further to say, I now submit the first of the amendments I have indicated, and I will submit the other as soon as we reach that part of the bill.

Mr. CUTTING. With the permission of the chairman of the Committee on Territories, I will make a suggestion in reference to this bill, which will apply to all others of the same character. I throw it out for reflection, and I submit it to the candid judgment of the gentleman from Illinois, and of the members of this committee.

It is very evident to me that there is a strong inclination on the part, probably, of a large majority of the committee, to adopt the course of policy of transferring the public lands upon a consideration in the nature of a contract. As I understand the theory of this and analogous bills, it is, that in order to open up the country, in the first place, and in the next, in order to obtain facilities for carrying the mails and munitions of war, the General Government undertakes to give, by patent, to the States, a bounty of land, upon a contract on the part of the States that they will apply it to a particular purpose, and that for all future time the mails and munitions of war shall be carried for the use of the Government upon such terms as the bill prescribes.

It is, therefore, in the nature of a contract or compact between the General Government and the State. Now I will beg to suggest what, I suppose, will result, in substance, to the same beneficial end as regards the State as this bill does; that there should be guarantees or safeguards, if possible, thrown around it. Under the terms of this bill, when the road is commenced and twenty miles of it are finished, they have the disposition of the lands on each side. And, as I understand it, the title to this property passes the very moment it becomes a complete bill. I understand that the moment this House concurs with the Senate, and the bill is approved by the Executive, eo instanti, the whole title of the United States to these lands passes to the Territory. And in this instance the quantity is somewhat considerable, say a million of acres; but that does not touch the principle, whether it be more or less. According to the terms of this bill, the very moment that it becomes a perfect law, that moment the title to these lands, or the right to locate them, at once is vested in the Territory.

Mr. ORR. For twenty miles.

Mr. CUTTING. Of course within the limits provided. Now I would suggest whether it would not be a wise precaution for this Congress to adopt in all these bills the provision which I shall read? I have sketched it hastily this morning in the shape of an amendment, rather for the purpose of drawing attention to it; and if gentlemen do not think that it contained the principles of safe legislation, why I am not in the least degree tenacious about it. The amendment which I have drawn will, perhaps, explain itself as well as I could verbally; but I will add to it a few observations still more explanatory of it. The title, as I observed, as provided under this bill, passes before the road is even surveyed, and before the spade is put into the ground. I propose that the Government shall retain its title, and shall issue patents as fast as the road is complete, and the terms of the amendment, I think, carry out the idea. I propose to add as a separate section, or at the end of the first section, the following:

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

NEW SERIES....No. 37.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That no patent shall be issued for any part of the lands hereinbefore mentioned until a continuous length of twenty miles of said road shall be completed; and when the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that any twenty continuous miles of said road are completed, then a patent shall issue for a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections, and included within a continuous length of twenty miles of said road; and so, from time to time, patents shall be issued, in like manner, upon the completion of each additional twenty miles of the said road until it shall be completed, when patents shall be issued for all of the said lands not already conveyed; and until patents shall be issued therefor the title to the said lands shall not vest in the said Territory. No patent shall issue for any part of the said lands until the said Territory shall in due form assent to the provisions of this act, and shall agree to fulfill the same.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman had read the fourth section of the bill he would have found that he proposes but a very slight change of the bill.

Mr. CUTTING. I respectfully submit to the chairman of the committee that there can be no doubt upon the construction of this whole bill that the title passes the moment the bill is completed. I propose, instead of the Government in making this contract parting with its whole land before the spade is put into the ground, that the title shall remain in the Government as security for the prosecution and completion of the work; so that as soon as twenty miles are completed then the patent shall issue for the amount of land to be granted along those twenty miles. Then when twenty more miles are completed the title should issue. I ask whether it does not come to the same thing as far as Minnesota is concerned, assuming that the Territory of Minnesota will—as I have no doubt she will do—appropriate these lands according to the purpose of the act.

Now, I ask, is it not a good precaution? Is it not more secure for the Government, if they really desire that this road shall be built, and that the Government shall have the benefit of that part of the act which results to it? Is it not safer, I say, for the Government to retain the title to the lands and transfer it from time to time as the road is completed?

In other words, Mr. Chairman, if the land did not belong to the Government, if it were the case of an individual land-owner, if, instead of this public land belonging to a political community it belonged to any one of you gentlemen, personally and individually, I ask whether you would not begin, when you made a contract, by protecting well your title to the land in question?

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from New York permit me for a moment?

Mr. CUTTING. Certainly.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I ask the gentleman from New York this question with the more anxiety because he in part represents the commercial metropolis of New York: whether or not, in undertaking to build this road, the first thing to be done is to get the money? We must go to New York for it, and perhaps go from New York to England. Now what effect will this amendment have on the capitalists of the country? For that is, after all, the main thing to look to. The road cannot be built without money. Will not this amendment then so frighten capitalists that money for it cannot be raised?

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. Chairman, whether the amendment that I have had the honor to introduce would or would not, if incorporated into this bill, alarm capitalists I cannot take upon me to decide. In the first place, I have never had any very great experience in such matters, and I am not a very good judge of them. In the first place, I never was in an operation of that kind myself, nor have

I had any agency whatever in borrowing money, or raising money, or pledging public property for the purpose. And perhaps my friend from Illinois could not apply to a gentleman in this House who could enlighten him so little as I feel myself capable of doing in this respect.

We are acting here, Mr. Chairman, not for these individuals. We are acting for the benefit and for the security of the Government. And it seems to me that in our anxiety as to what capitalists will do in favor of those who undertake to borrow money, we should look a little, at the same time, to the Government, and see whether or not we are securing them.

Mr. WENTWORTH, (interrupting.) Then how is the road to be built? We want to build the road, and must have the money to do so.

Mr. CUTTING. If this land and road are to fall into the hands of men so feeble that, with a legislative enactment which gives them in equity the whole of the land in question—if, I say, they are so feeble, and have such little means, that with this bill passed and signed by the President, and making a transfer of all the right, title, and interest under that bill, they cannot raise the money, then it seems to me we are dealing with a very uncertain set of men.

Mr. ORR. Will the gentleman from New York yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. CUTTING. With pleasure.

Mr. ORR. If I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York I think it is entitled to the grave consideration of this committee. We have been in the habit of granting these alternate sections of public land to secure the construction of a road, and our policy has been to make the grant in such a way as that the land should not be sacrificed.

Now, if this amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York will furnish an additional security, I do not see why the friends of the measure—myself among the number—should not accept of it. The effect of the gentleman's amendment, and what he desires, is, if I understand it, simply to require that the company shall be able to raise sufficient funds to build twenty miles of the road before the title of any of the lands vests; and I think, with him, that if this be the effect of it, the company would be weak and feeble indeed if it could not raise a sufficient sum of money to build twenty miles of the road.

Mr. CUTTING resumed the floor.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Will the gentleman from New York allow me a word?

Mr. CUTTING. Not just now. I would simply remark that when I rose for the purpose of submitting that amendment, it was with no intention whatever of taking a gladiatorial part in the matter; for really, I am not tenacious about it. I simply think, and thought, that it was a wise and prudent precaution, such as an ordinary man of common prudence would resort to if he were only dealing with his own property.

I know no better rule of legislation than for public men to act in regard to public matters in the same way that they would individually with their own private means.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question as to the effect of his amendment. It is well known that when railroads are built, they issue bonds upon the pledge of the road, but where the road is not a sufficient security for the capitalists, or where they think it is not, they give security upon the land besides the road. Now I ask whether he supposes a mortgage upon these roads, with a contingent security upon the land, would be a good bond?

Mr. CUTTING. I have no doubt about it. I have no doubt but an assignment by the parties to whom the States or Territories shall give the lands, of all their rights and interests, subject to the requirements of this act, would vest the equitable title of these parties to the extent that the grantees of the State or Territory held.

Although, as I said before, I am sorry that I undertook to meddle with this matter at all, yet there is another suggestion I will make. This bill, if I understand it, proceeds upon a doctrine which seeks to avoid and steer clear of all constitutional objections anywhere. And, I must say, that I am at a loss to perceive why it does not do so successfully—even assuming that there otherwise would be, from the mere donation, from the mere voluntary gift, any difficulty in that matter. This bill proceeds upon the ground that the Government in disposing of land, may dispose of it upon, and for a consideration. And it is for the legislative branch of the Government to judge whether or not the consideration is one which ought to be accepted for the property. Now, the consideration upon the face of this bill appears to be this. In the first place, they are to transport the mails, not at such a rate of compensation as either the Territory of Minnesota or its grantees shall fix, but at a price to be named by Congress, or until Congress acts thereon through the proper department of the Government. That is one consideration for the grant of this land.

Another is this: If in the future the Government desires to transport men and munitions of war to the frontiers, or anywhere over this road, they shall have the right so to do, free of all charge on the part of the railroad.

Now, as I understand it, this is a disposition of the lands for a consideration. But whenever this Government enters into a contract with individuals, or when it enters into contract with States, as with Missouri in 1821, and with the State of Texas at a more recent period, what was the course of legislation? Was it not to require the consent of both the contracting parties to carry out the stipulations to be fulfilled on their part? I submit to the chairman of the committee that in this, and all other bills of this kind, you should add a clause to the effect that no patent shall issue for any part until the said territory shall, in due form, assent to the provisions of this act, and shall agree to fulfill the same.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUTTING] this question: If Congress makes a grant of land to a State, with a certain condition annexed, is not the acceptance of the grant by the State an agreement to fulfill the condition? Another question which I propose to ask is this: The gentleman desires to keep the patent, which is the highest element of title in the hands of the Government, until the road proceeds pari passu fifteen to twenty miles; but for what consideration, and to secure what object, is this requisite? He says the consideration in this bill is, that the mails and troops of the United States are to be transported; and in order to secure that consideration, he desires to keep the evidence of the title in the Government until the road proceeds fifteen or twenty miles. Does not the gentleman know that the States which receive these grants never do make the roads themselves, and therefore that we have to rely, not upon our grants to the States, but upon the other conditions and agreements which the States make with the companies who do construct the roads, for the fulfillment of the conditions which Congress imposes upon them.

Mr. CUTTING. If that be so, then I submit to the candid consideration of the House that there is a greater necessity for the amendment I offered. I submit to the candid consideration of gentlemen, when the Territory of Minnesota parts with this land to individuals, and parts with it in such a manner that these individuals control it, whether it does not show the necessity of having an amendment of the kind I suggest?

Mr. McNAIR. I rise to a question of order. It appears to me that the time for debate has expired. Two hours have passed, and no person has a right to speak except the chairman of the committee [Mr. RICHARDSON] who reported the bill. He was entitled to one hour at the commencement of the debate, and, under the rules, is entitled to the privilege of another hour at the close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the right to make his point of order, but he cannot argue the question.

Mr. McNAIR. My question of order is, that the two hours, the time allotted for the discussion, having expired, whether any person, except the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, has the right to continue the discussion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the gentleman from Illinois who reported the bill yielded the floor to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cutting] for the purpose of explanation.

Mr. McNAIR. Can this debate be considered as an explanation?

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps it has trespassed beyond the bounds of an explanation.

Mr. CUTTING. I am satisfied that my friend from Alabama [Mr. Phillips] will not dine well if I do not answer this question. In the first place, the gentleman misunderstood me most grievously when he supposes that I offered this amendment for no other purpose than to secure the transportation of the mail, troops, and munitions of war. I offered the amendment for the purpose of securing the building of the road. That was the purpose, and not the other, which the gentleman attributes to me. So much for question number one. The gentleman asks me again, as a lawyer, that if this bill is passed in the shape in which it is now presented, and upon what he chooses to call a condition, whether or not the land will rest, if that condition is not complied with? That is the question which the gentleman put to me, as I understand it. I say, in reply, that if there is any horn-book in law, which does not lay down the proposition that a condition subsequent never voids the grant, then I have not had the good fortune to meet with it. The condition precedent must be performed; and the effect of my amendment is to make the building of the road a condition precedent. It is to meet that identical thing.

Mr. DISNEY. I am desired by gentlemen around me to be brief. I will be so, for I am too unwell to occupy the attention of the committee for any considerable period of time, even if I felt disposed to do so. I cannot speak without much pain—

The CHAIRMAN, (interrupting.) The Chair will remark to the gentleman from Ohio that the general debate upon the bill under consideration having closed by order of the House, he can only proceed with his remarks with the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Richardson,] who, having reported the bill, is entitled to close the debate.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cutting.]

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is pending.

Mr. DISNEY. I understood him to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. He did not. The first amendment pending is that offered by the gentleman from Illinois, to strike out a portion of the two first lines of the bill. The gentleman from New York has only indicated his intention of offering an amendment.

Mr. DISNEY. Then I will reserve what I intended to say until the gentleman does offer it.

Mr. BISSELL. With the consent of my colleague, I should like to say a few words upon the subject of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. BISSELL. I have only a few remarks to offer. As to the matter of securing to the Government the right to transport the mails over this road I look upon it as something of very little importance. We know that if these railroads are built they will allow the mails to be transported over them for a reasonable compensation; and I regard the provisions in all these railroad bills making such a condition as of the smallest possible consequence. If we could have no provision for transporting the mails except under the authority here provided I should think it would be but small security.

The provision for the transportation of troops, too, I do not consider a matter of any appreciable importance. Why, sir, when the time comes, and the directors of these roads refuse to transport the United States troops over them, what has the Government to do but to take their cars and their locomotives and transport the troops? The Government is not at their mercy, whether we make these provisions in this bill, and in other railroad bills, or not. They will transport their troops and ammunitions of war without the consent of these railroad companies if they cannot with their consent.

Mr. FULLER. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois. I ask him whether it would not be well enough to incorporate into this bill a provision requiring the territorial government of Minnesota, whenever they shall incorporate a company to build this road, to set forth the terms affixed to this grant in their charter? Otherwise, how shall we know that they will charter the company without imposing any of these conditions? I would suggest an amendment requiring these conditions to be incorporated in the charter of the company which is to build the road.

Mr. BISSELL. The bill as it now stands embraces everything to which the gentleman alludes. There is no power in the Territorial Legislature to act in violation of the provisions of an act of Congress. I have no special objection to the modification the gentleman from Maine suggests, but I regard it as wholly unnecessary and superfluous. I do not think the matter of sufficient importance to make it worth while to spend much time upon it; but if the gentleman chooses to move an amendment requiring the Legislature of the Territory to make such arrangements as to carry out the conditions of this bill I shall not object to it.

Mr. HENN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois if Congress have not the power at any time to annul any act improperly passed by the Territorial Legislature?

Mr. BISSELL. Why, of course; and to take the railroad for military purposes at any time when they need it.

I was going to suggest to the gentleman from New York whether the greater portion of what he proposes to effect by his amendment might not be better effected by a simple provision saying that these lands shall revert to the General Government, if the road is not completed and in operation within a certain specified time?

Mr. CUTTING. There is a provision of that description in the bill already.

Mr. BISSELL. I have not examined that part of the bill; but I think that if it contains a provision that unless the road is completed within a certain number of years the lands shall revert to the Government we have all the security for the building of the road that we ought to ask.

Mr. CUTTING. I would submit this difficulty to the gentleman: Suppose this bill passes; no persons can differ about the fact that the whole title of the United States will be thereby vested in absolute fee simple in the Territory of Minnesota; and no man will deny that the patent that is issued under this bill will be a clean patent, without any condition whatever upon the face of it.

Now, it is said that the lands thus granted will be taken by the grantee, the Territory of Minnesota, into Wall street and money will be raised upon them, on the security of the lands. Now, I ask, when these lands are thus transferred to the moneyed men of Wall street, upon this advance of money, whether their title will not be paramount to that of all others, and whether it would be in the least degree affected by the fact that the men who had got the money had gambled it away or had wasted it, or by the fact that the road was not built? Would not their title to the land in either of those cases be quite as good, and would not the General Government be remedyless? Would not the Territory of Minnesota be without relief? I submit, therefore, that it is better for all parties that this security should be put in the bill, and I would like gentlemen to take it into serious consideration.

Mr. BISSELL. I am happy to have an opportunity of answering the gentleman most satisfactorily to myself, at least. In the case of the Illinois Central railroad grant this very question came up, and it was one of very great importance to the State, to the company, and especially to those who had loaned the company seventeen millions of dollars. It was investigated by some of the most eminent lawyers in New York, and also in Illinois, and the conclusion arrived at was, that the title still remained conditionally in the United States, and that those who advanced their money did it with their eyes open, and with a knowledge of the fact that, unless the road was completed within ten years, the lands would revert to the General Government. So that there is nothing, in my judgment, in the objection of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to call the attention of the committee—

Mr. LETCHER. Will my friend allow me to put a question to his colleague over the way, who has just taken his seat?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, I think this discussion has gone quite far enough.

Mr. LETCHER. I merely wish to ask one question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, I will yield for that purpose—for one question only.

Mr. LETCHER. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Bissell] to say that it was the opinion of lawyers in Illinois, and the opinion of lawyers in New York, that the lands donated to the Illinois Central railroad did not become the property of that company, or of those to whom they were transferred, until the road was completed.

Mr. DISNEY. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the language of the bill itself.

Mr. LETCHER. I want to understand this matter, and I will therefore propound my question to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DISNEY. I am about to explain it. I do not believe the gentleman from Virginia has ever read the bill.

Mr. LETCHER. Oh, yes, I have read it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I really cannot yield any longer. I must claim the floor.

Mr. LETCHER. One moment longer. If the proper construction of the law be that intimated by the gentleman from Illinois, what is the meaning of the provision in this bill exempting the lands from taxation by the State?

Mr. DISNEY. There seems to be so much confusion of ideas as to this matter, that I feel compelled to say a word or two. Now, this bill provides that the lands unsold shall revert to the United States, and that to those sold by the States under its provisions the title shall be vested in the party. There is no room for misconception. The bill is express; and if gentlemen will read it, they will find that the land remaining unsold shall revert to the United States. Then why all this discussion about the legal effect of it?

But again: This bill provides that the State may sell the land for twenty continuous miles, the effect of which is to aid the company in the construction of the first twenty miles of the road, the time when this aid is the most important. After they have constructed this twenty miles of the road, then, and not till then, can the State sell another twenty continuous miles of land; and so on, applying successively the proceeds of each range of twenty miles to the construction of the corresponding length of the road. Hence, the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cutting] has no effect by way of security beyond this. It affects only the first twenty miles of the land, because, I repeat, a further sale cannot be had until that twenty miles of the road is actually completed. There is no question beyond that.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order. Is not this the rule: Any gentleman may propose an amendment to the bill, and speak five minutes in its favor; and any other gentleman may reply for five minutes. If that be the rule, I want to see it enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is occupying the floor, and has yielded to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KERR. I thought that the gentleman's hour had expired.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not yet expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Ohio will have an opportunity to discuss this question when the amendment is offered. I have indulged gentlemen as far as I possibly could.

I will say, in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cutting,] that when his amendment comes up properly for consideration before the committee, I shall give my views in regard to it. The only question is, whether they shall have twenty miles before they complete the road, or afterwards?

Mr. CUTTING. Or rather, shall have it from time to time, as they do the work.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Exactly. The question is, shall they have twenty miles on the road before they commence or not?

Mr. CUTTING. The question is, shall they have the whole grant at once, or get it twenty miles at a time?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The fourth section of the bill provides that they are only to have the land for twenty miles, as the road progresses. However, we shall discuss that question with the gentleman when his amendment comes up. I have no objection to his proposition at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] to strike out of the first section of the bill the following words:

—"for facilitating the transportation of the mails, men, and munitions of war, and other purposes."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move to strike from the first section the following words:

—"with the privilege of extending the same to the northern terminus of the Illinois Central railroad on the Mississippi river."

Mr. HENN. I hope the gentleman from Maine will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to amend the bill in the tenth line, by adding the words "inside the Territory of Minnesota," so as to confine the operation of the bill to lands inside the Territory.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CUTTING. Now that we have got to the end of this section, I move to amend by inserting what I have already suggested.

Mr. RICHARDSON, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from New York permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CUTTING. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that his amendment would come in more appropriately in the fourth section.

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, in a great measure it would. Then I withdraw my motion to amend.

Mr. PRINGLE. I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "alienate," in the tenth line. It would read then "every section of land," &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I oppose that amendment, for the purpose of asking a question from the chairman of the Committee on Territories.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. TAYLOR. I want some little information as to the propriety of the first amendment which was adopted, and which seems to me of no importance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Ohio, that in opposing the amendment just submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRINGLE,] inquiries cannot be made as to a different amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that by the rules of the House I must speak strictly to the point, but as no other member of the committee kept up to the rule, I thought I might be permitted to ask my friend from Illinois a simple question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let the gentleman from Ohio be favored for the purpose.

Mr. TAYLOR. What I want to know is this, whether this bill, after the adoption of the amendment, suggested in the first instance, secures to the United States the privilege of transporting the mails and munitions of war?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly; that is provided for in the fifth section. If the gentleman will read the fifth, the last, section of the bill he will find that the privilege is assured.

Mr. TAYLOR. If I understand the fifth section it relates simply to the transportation of the mails of the United States.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, the gentleman will find the balance in the third section. We have not struck out anything.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then I have a few words to say against the amendment of the gentleman from New York, to strike out the word "alternate," if it be in order for me to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will be in order in doing so.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will explain to the committee the principle on which I have voted with respect to these railroad grants, as I wish to be understood in the matter. I voted for these grants on the belief that the alternate sections of land which were retained by the Government of the United States are made by the construction of the railroads which we authorize equal in value to the whole of the sections along the line. And so far that is the result of our experience in the State of Illinois, and the other parts of the country to which grants were made for the building of railroads. I had occasion this morning, while this discussion was going on, to refer to the communication of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and examine the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior for the past year. And if my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. KERR,] who addressed us this morning so ably in opposition to these grants, and particularly in opposition to the railroad grant which we are about to make to the Territory of Minnesota, had referred that annual communication of the Secretary of the Interior, and especially to the communication of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, I feel assured that he would not have asserted here, as he did, that these grants had a tendency to diminish the sales and the revenues from the public lands.

Sir, the report of the Secretary of the Interior, and the communication of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, show directly the opposite, and that vast amounts of sales have been made beyond those of former years, in consequence of the adoption of this policy by Congress. I have these documents before me, and I will read a few paragraphs from them, in order to bring this subject properly before the committee and the country, because I think the remark of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR] a most important one. The Secretary of the Interior, on the 5th December, 1853, said:

"The land system is founded in correct principles, and needs but little modification or change. The preemption feature might possibly be advantageously enlarged and made more liberal. Sound policy requires that every encouragement should be held out for actual settlement and cultivation.

Nothing retards the growth and prosperity of the country more, nor inflicts greater injury upon the resident, than the possession, by individuals or companies, of extensive uncultivated tracts of the public lands. To correct this evil, facilities should be liberally extended to the actual settler, and withheld from the mere speculator.

During the last fiscal year 9,819,411 acres have been surveyed, and 10,363,891 acres brought into the market. In the same period there were—

Sold.....	1,083,495 acres
Located with military bounty land warrants.....	6,142,360 "
Located with other certificates.....	9,427 "

Showing an increase in quantity sold and located with land warrants, and under grants, of 12,231,818 acres over the previous fiscal year.

The quantity of land sold during the second and third quarters of 1852 was 334,451 acres; amount received therefor $623,687 59.

Quantity sold during the second and third quarters of 1853, 1,609,919 acres; amount received therefor $2,226,878 36.

The whole number of land warrants issued, under existing laws, up to the 30th September last, was 266,042; of which there were then outstanding 66,947. The quantity of land required to satisfy the latter is 4,778,120 acres.

Warrants have been issued to the 30th September last, under the act of 11th February, 1847, calling for..... 12,879,280 acres.

There have been issued, under the act of the 31st August, 1852, for the satisfaction of Virginia land warrants, 1,657 pieces of land scrip, embracing 129,669 acres. It is supposed the scrip yet to be issued under this act will require 870,000 acres.

It may be several years before the land warrants and scrip will be exhausted, and, until then, the amount of land sold for cash will be comparatively small.

The entire area of the public domain is estimated at about 1,584,000,000 acres. That within the States (exclusive of California) is 471,892,439 acres.

Its purchase was effected at the rate of 14.41 cents per acre, amounting to..... $67,999,700

Up to the 30th June, 1853, 334,256,810 acres had been sold, at an expense of 2.07 cents per acre, making..... 6,919,116

expense for selling, at 5.32 cents per acre, making.....	9,824,291

The entire cost (including surveying and selling) being.....	$88,994,013
--	--------------

The whole amount accruing from sales up to 30th June, 1853, was..... $142,283,478
Being $53,289,465 more than the cost of the whole, thus far, inclusive of survey and sale.

Of the surveyed lands there have been granted—
For educational purposes..... 11,199,973 acres.
For military bounties..... 24,641,980 "
And for internal improvements..... 16,007,013 "

There yet remain of the surveyed lands 95,940,700 acres, worth, after deducting the cost of selling yet to be borne..... $116,018,641
And 137,635,629 acres, worth, after deducting the expense of surveying and selling..... 161,873,263

Making.....	$277,891,904
To which add the net profits received for lands actually sold.....	53,289,465

And we find that, while the purchase, survey, and sale of the public land will, in the end, have cost $88,994,013, the net amount which will have been realized therefor is the enormous sum of..... $331,181,369

It is thus shown that the General Government, instead of being a loser, as many have supposed, by its connection with the public lands, has found them not only a source of revenue, but a ready means of promoting the cause of general education, and of bestowing well-earned rewards for military service."

And the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his report of the 5th of December, 1853, said:

"The great increase in sales and locations of land for the last fiscal year, and in the third quarter of the current calendar year, mentioned in a former part of this report, has occurred in those States where railroads have been projected and grants made for them, or where such works are in contemplation, or by the proposed construction of the Sault Ste. Marie canal. As evidence of this fact, I would state that the lands withdrawn from sale in Illinois, to enable that State to select those granted to her by the act of 20th September, 1850, were again brought into market in July, August, and September, 1852, deducting, of course, 2,595,053 14-100 acres selected by her under that grant. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853, in that State there were sold for cash..... 298,861 acres.
Located with land warrants..... 2,509,120 "

Total..... 2,807,981 acres.
Being about one and a quarter million more than all the lands sold (excluding the locations of warrants) during the preceding fiscal year, in all the land States and Territory."

"To grants of this character for railroads, canals, &c., not one tangible or substantial objection can be presented. The increased value given to the lands enables the Government to get double price, and a ready sale for those retained, and hence the grant costs them nothing. The same reason removes all difficulty in relation to the pledge given by the United States, at the cession of these lands, that they should be considered a common fund, for the use and benefit of all the States, and renders them more available towards meeting the obligation imposed on them by the act of 28th January, 1847, that the proceeds should be set apart for the payment of the public debt created by that act. Let these railroads and canals be completed, and the husbandman will no longer have reason to complain that his grain remains ungathered from year to year because there is no mode of sending it to market; it will all be eagerly sought after, and, with his surplus stock, will be sent abroad over the land, to feed thousands of his less fortunate fellow-beings, while he will thus be made to rejoice in the prosperity secured by his honest toil and industry, saying nothing of the advantages to the business and finance of the country.

"Moreover, these means of intercommunication, like iron bands, will unite the whole country together by a community of interest and feeling, and, like the arteries of the human system, will disseminate to every part the benefits of home production, and of the Eastern, Pacific, and Atlantic trade, when the great California railroad shall have been completed."

So it appears that it does not diminish the amount of land disposed of by the General Government. Though the amount of revenue to the National Treasury may be diminished, it is because of the donations heretofore made in the form of military grants, which have been the occasion of the issuing of a vast number of military warrants. But the great object of a settlement and occupation of the public lands, and the facilities offered for travel and commercial intercourse, are at once promoted by this policy, without the loss of one dollar to the General Government. What if some persons do make money by these great railroad enterprises? Energetic men, of talent and industry, cannot be expected to engage in such enterprises without a prospect of reward. And if we can cause them to be carried out without loss to the Government there our duty ends, and the success of those who construct them only adds to the general prosperity.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HIESTER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The House was being divided upon the motion, when—

Mr. HIESTER said: I am informed that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CUTTING,] who has introduced the amendment, intends to leave the city in the morning, and I therefore withdraw my motion.

Mr. SOLLERS. I renew it.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and FAULKNER, were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 59.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly Senate bill No. 138, being a bill entitled "An act to aid the Territory of Minnesota in the construction of a railroad for military, postal, and for other purposes," but had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move that the House adjourn.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 9, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have two memorials signed by citizens of Maine, who set forth that they were seamen on board the John Adams during the war of 1812 with Great Britain; that said vessel was destroyed by order of its commanding officer, Commodore Morris, and that in consequence of that destruction they lost all their effects, and suffered great privations and hardships. They therefore ask that such remuneration may be made to them as justice and equity require. I move that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I present the proceedings of a meeting of the students of Hamilton college, in the State of New York, protesting against the passage of the Nebraska and Kansas bill.

Also, the proceedings and resolutions of the Philadelphia Female Anti-Slavery Society, remonstrating against the passage of the same bill.

Also, a remonstrance of one hundred citizens of the city of New York, protesting against the same bill.

I have also a remonstrance, which is filled to the extent of one hundred feet with signatures of the citizens of Brooklyn, in the State of New York, protesting against the passage of the same bill. In this, and the remonstrance coming from New York city, the residence of each subscriber is given, and the whole number of subscribers to the last is three thousand. I move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CASS presented a petition of citizens of Trenton, New Jersey, praying the enactment of such laws as will best secure the protection of American citizens in the enjoyment of their rights of conscience and of religious worship while residing in foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, a petition of inhabitants of Cass county, Michigan, remonstrating against the passage of the Nebraska and Kansas bill in its present form; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented resolutions of the State of New Jersey, requesting their representatives in Congress to use their best efforts to procure the passage of a law granting to the officers and soldiers who were in the service of the United States in the war of 1812 the same privileges and grants of land as have been granted to the soldiers in the more recent wars of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RUSK presented the memorial of Seth Ingram, praying an increase of pension, in consequence of wounds received in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FITZPATRICK presented a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, praying Congress to reduce the price of certain pine lands in said State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SUMNER presented three petitions of citizens of Massachusetts, remonstrating against any bill for the organization of the Territory of Nebraska which will permit slavery within the territory from which it was excluded by the Missouri compromise; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of Harriet A. Wilcox, widow of an officer in the Revenue Cutter Service, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a petition of G. Wilcox and other officers of the Army, praying an increase of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAWSON submitted an additional document in relation to the claim of the heirs of John Hudry for compensation for services rendered and advances made to the United States in 1814 and 1815; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, presented a memorial of citizens of Memphis, Tennessee, praying that measures may be taken to secure the right of religious liberty to American citizens while residing or traveling in foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of James M. Crane, praying compensation for publishing orders, resolutions, laws, and treaties of the United States, in the California Courier, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WELLER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of Francisco Lope Urziza, a citizen of California, praying remuneration for losses sustained during the late war with Mexico, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PETTIT, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a bill to confirm the claim of Dusan de la Croix to a tract of land therein described, reported it back without amendment.

He also submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Almanzon Huston, praying compensation for carrying the mail, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a report of the Postmaster General, communicating the papers in relation to the services of Jemison and Williamson, called for by a resolution of the Senate of the 30th December, 1847, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Robert Jemison and Benjamin Williamson; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL POST ROUTE.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Appleton to Waupaka, in Wisconsin.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. GWIN asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill to establish a post road in the State of California; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. President, the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill granting a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands to actual settlers, have done me the honor, unanimously, to direct me to report it back to the Senate without amendment, and to recommend its passage. They have further directed me to move that the consideration of the bill be postponed to next Monday week, the twentieth instant, and that it be made the special order for that day.

Mr. DAWSON. I desire the Senator from Wisconsin to oblige me by extending the time which he has designated for the consideration of this bill to a more distant day. Circumstances make it necessary for both the Senators from Georgia to be absent for a short time, and I desire to be here when the bill comes up for action.

Mr. WALKER. Permit me to say to the Senator that if the bill be taken up on the day which I have named, by direction of the Committee on Public Lands, I have no idea that final action will be had upon it before the Senator returns. He will have ample time to participate in the discussion and disposition of this bill.

Mr. DAWSON. The honorable Senator's explanation is perfectly satisfactory.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES ROBERTSON.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, some days ago one of the Senators from Mississippi presented a petition of one James Robertson, who alleges that he has large claims upon this body, by way of compensation for injuries which he sustained by reason of an imprisonment of him by order of the Senate, as he says. The imprisonment was by the officers of the Senate, but it does not appear that it was by order of the Senate. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate have had that matter under consideration, and have directed me to present an adverse report. This is a subject which has twice before been considered by the committees of the Senate, and the previous reports are appended to and constitute a part of the report now made. I move that the report which I now present be printed; but I do not think it is necessary to print the former reports, as they are probably within the knowledge of most members, and are to be found in the books containing the proceedings of the Senate. I have myself a printed copy of them. I present the report, and move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM MAYO.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to report back without amendment, and recommend the passage of, the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of William Mayo, of Belfast, Maine.

I wish also to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have the bill considered now.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to increase William Mayo's pension three dollars per month, so as to make it eight dollars per month, during his natural life, from the 1st of January, 1854.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. Let the report of the committee be read.

Mr. HAMLIN. I can state the facts of the case sooner than the Clerk can read the report.

Several SENATORS. There is no objection to the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then it is not necessary to make any explanation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

ARKANSAS JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

On the motion of Mr. SEBASTIAN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill from the House of Representatives to amend an act entitled "An act to divide the State of Arkansas into two judicial districts," approved March 3, 1851, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment.

The bill, as it came from the House, proposed to direct, that, upon conviction of offenders in the western judicial district of the State of Arkansas, for offenses to which punishment by confinement in the penitentiary is annexed, it shall be lawful for the court before whom convictions have or may be had, to sentence convicts to undergo imprisonment in the penitentiary house of the State situated in the eastern judicial district in the same manner as though the penitentiary house was situated in the western judicial district of the State of Arkansas, and to add the counties of Sevier and Sebastian to the western judicial district.

The amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was to add the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any person shall be convicted, in the district court for the western district of Arkansas, of any offense, committed after the passage of this act, the punishment or part of the punishment whereof is imprisonment by the laws now existing, the said punishment or part of the punishment shall be confinement and imprisonment, with hard labor, for the same length of time, and shall be carried into effect as provided in the preceding section.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in the twenty-fifth section of an act entitled "An act to regulate intercourse with the Indian tribes, and preserve peace on the frontiers," approved 30th of June, 1834, shall be construed to extend or apply to said Indian country any of the laws enacted for the District of Columbia, and that nothing contained in the twentieth section of the said act, which provides for the punishment of offenses therein specified, shall be construed to extend to any Indian committing said offenses in the Indian country, or to any Indian committing any offense who has been punished by the local law of the tribe, or in any case where, by treaty stipulations, the exclusive jurisdiction over such offenses may now or hereafter be secured to said Indian tribes, respectively, and anything in said act inconsistent with this act be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any white person who shall hereafter set fire, or attempt to set fire, to any house, out house, cabin, stable, or other building, in said Indian country, to whomsoever belonging; and any Indian who shall set fire to any house, out-house, cabin, stable, or other building, in said Indian country, belonging to or in lawful possession of a white person, in whole or in part, and whether the same be consumed or not, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and shall be punished by confinement and imprisonment, with hard labor, for not more than twenty-one nor less than two years.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That any white person who shall make an assault upon an Indian, or other person, or any Indian who shall make an assault upon a white person, within said Indian country, with a gun, rifle, sword, pistol, knife, or any other deadly weapon, with intent to kill or maim the person so assaulted, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and shall, on conviction, be punished with confinement and imprisonment, with hard labor, for not more than five years nor less than one year.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That in all criminal cases, upon indictment, for offenses committed in said Indian country, prior to the creation of said western district of Arkansas, now pending in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas, process for witnesses residing or to be found in said western district may issue to the marshal of said eastern district, and be executed by him in any part of said western district; and that the fees of all witnesses so summoned shall be paid by the United States.

On the motion of Mr. SEBASTIAN, a verbal amendment was made to the amendment of the committee in the third section, which does not alter the sense of the section.

The amendment as amended was agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in, and was ordered to be engrossed; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read a third time, and passed.

SOLAR COMPASS.

On the motion of Mr. STUART, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill to enable the United States to make use of the solar compass in the public surveys.

No amendment being proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate; and the question was stated to be on ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. EVANS. I should desire to know something more about this bill before the question is taken. I have not even heard the report read; but I heard a partial discussion upon it the other day. Its object is to compensate the individual named in the bill for improvements made upon the compass which has been used by the United States in the surveys. The United States have used that compass, and have, as I understand, paid for the use; and now it is asked that he should have $15,000 to enable the Government still to use it. I do not see upon what principle we are asked to do this. I do not see any great public benefit which is to result from it.

Mr. STUART. I think I can satisfy the Senator from South Carolina in a moment by a reference to a statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The Commissioner states that already there has been saved to the United States $622,080 on lands that could not have been surveyed without this compass. The proposition that the inventor himself made, was only to give him one mill on every acre of land that could not be surveyed without it. The Senator will see that the lands to be afterwards surveyed, and which could not be done without this compass, would make the amount not thousands only, but would run it into millions.

I remarked the other day that I considered it the very strongest case that could be presented to the consideration of Congress, upon the facts here stated. There are several extracts in the report of the Commissioner, going to show that it is indispensable. For instance, in Arkansas there was a tract of country which was not surveyed, and the Commissioner certifies that, without this compass, it could not have been surveyed, on account of the local attraction. There is a place there called the magnetic pole, I think, that never was surveyed, and could not have been with the ordinary compass. So that the Senate will see that the amount which is proposed to be paid this man is a mere trivial sum in comparison with the great benefit derived by the Government of the United States.

The question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and the President decided that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. CASS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CASS. I desire to say a word upon this subject. I have some knowledge myself of surveying. Nothing is more uncertain than the old compass. The needle is forever, even under the most favorable circumstances, liable to err; and it has occasioned a vast loss to the country by trusting to it. Here is an invention which literally, in the mineral regions, obviates the necessity of relying upon the other. You cannot survey without it unless you run a line by putting up stakes, which would be a most tedious and everlasting operation.

This invention we have used; our officers have used it in the surveys; they could not have done their work properly without it. It is a beneficial and most useful invention; we have used it, and saved thousand and thousands of dollars, as well as disputes with regard to lines; and now the recommendation is to pay him the small sum of $15,000. I cannot see upon what principle you can refuse it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I listened to the discussion on this subject the other day, and it led me to an investigation of the matter. I confess I was impressed with the belief that the principle of the bill was all wrong. The investigation of it, however, has satisfied me that it is all right; and I can give it my vote with cheerfulness.

Mr. STUART. I will not detain the Senate long; but I will add a remark or two to what I have already said. It was said the other day that this man had a patent, which was true. He spent, however, the whole fourteen years during which that patent existed in perfecting it; and the compass now used is not called the compass which was patented, but it is "Burt's improved solar compass." He received, under that patent, eighty dollars. The question to him was, whether he would ask the Government to renew the patent, which would put the Government and its surveyors at his mercy entirely, or whether he would not ask that, but would ask the Government to make him some compensation for the some twenty odd years of his life which had been spent in making this valuable invention. He resolved to adopt the latter course; and I will repeat, if Senators were not giving attention to what I said before, the Commissioner of the General Land Office states that in the upper peninsula of Michigan, in Wisconsin, in Arkansas, and, he also stated, in Oregon, California, New Mexico, and Utah, there are large districts of country that, without this, could not be surveyed. The thing could not be done. Here are certificates to that effect from surveyors in the Lake Superior region. There is one from Professor John Locke, of Boston, in which he says that not only did the ordinary compass vary as usual, but it absolutely pointed south. As I said, this man asked the Commissioner of the General Land Office whether he would recommend Congress to pay him one mill on an acre for the land that could not be surveyed without his invention. The Commissioner says that that would give him over $9,000 for what has already been done, and it is but a commencement. He therefore recommends that Congress pay some sum, not only for the use which has been had, but for the use in all time to come, and withhold from him a patent. I have no hesitation in saying that this will be a saving to the Government.

Mr. EVANS. I understand the Senator to say that a patent has been issued to this man for this invention.

Mr. STUART. The Senator misunderstands me. His first patent, which was for the old compass, expired. Under that he received $80 for his instruments. He has not received a patent for his improved invention. Instead of proposing to renew his patent, which would place the Government at his mercy, he proposes to take a small compensation for the use, by the Government, of his instrument. The Senate will see in a moment that nobody but the Government is benefited by this.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to ask the Senator a question. I understood him to say that the Government has been using this invention in the surveys. Has it been in violation of the patent, or has it been by the consent of the individual? The Senator states that a patent would place the Government entirely subject to the mercy of the inventor. Has he consented to the use of it heretofore? If he has had a patent all this time, and the Government was at his mercy, how has he realized but eighty dollars?

Mr. STUART. I understand these to be the facts. His patent expired in 1850. Most of the surveys of the lands to which I have alluded have been made since that time. The question to determine in his own mind was, whether he would ask a renewal of that patent from Congress, or a compensation in money. He has determined—and the chief use has been since that time. It is stated very distinctly, by the manufacturer, that under his original patent, he got but eighty dollars.

Mr. DAWSON. It is only the principle involved in this case that induces me to say anything upon the subject. This solar compass has been patented under the laws authorizing patents to be issued, and it belongs to the individual.

Mr. STUART. Not this compass. I will say to the Senator that he patented a compass which involved the original principle, the patent for which expired in 1850. The improved compass now in use, and which does this work for the Government, is not patented.

Mr. DAWSON. Which he has a right to have patented, I suppose.

Mr. STUART. He would have had.

Mr. DAWSON. And will have, if this bill passes.

Mr. STUART. No, sir. I will state to the Senator, he cannot. The Senator must know the patent laws in that respect. He has permitted the use of the compass for so long a time by the public, that he cannot have it patented under the general laws. He would be obliged to apply to Congress for a patent.

Mr. DAWSON. That is what I understand; but we are in the habit of granting patents in all similar cases. All patents are useful to some purpose, and if they are useful exclusively to a few individuals, those persons will have to pay a high price for them, as there will not be a great demand for them. But it is said that this patent is valuable to the United States in the survey of lands. So was the old compass; so are all the instruments connected with surveying valuable; and many of them are patented, and they go into the hands of surveyors on the ground of their usefulness. Every instrument necessary to carry on the machinery of Government must be purchased by this Government, and now it is said that this individual will not apply for a patent, if a payment of $15,000 is made to him by the Government.

I know it is needless to suggest the Constitution of the United States, and ask where it is that we get the power to purchase these various inventions; when the Constitution prescribes precisely how the inventors are to be protected. I do think, myself, that we had better pursue the old course. If our surveyors need this kind of compass, let them pay the market price. If the Government desire to purchase any one of these compasses, let them pay the price for them, and not become the common purchaser of the particular or special right of the individual. It is opening a gate so that we cannot tell how extensive and wide may be the consequences that will follow. The reaper may be a most important and useful invention in some sections of the country. It comes back to this question, one of constitutional authority. We have surveyed all the lands within the limits of the United States, subject to our control; and, so far, we have done it without any difficulty that I have heard of before, save the variation of the compass, which has existed always from the period of its discovery; and I think we had better adhere to its use. One step in this way leads to many more.

We are giving more outlets for appropriations, and making the Government the purchaser of more articles than the Constitution ever contemplated, and, in my judgment, more than ever ought to be. I have no doubt, from what Senators say in relation to this compass, that it is exceedingly valuable; but at the same time, I maintain that the better policy is to pay the price of the instrument; and if the individual who is the inventor has lost the patent by his own negligence, we will give him a law to renew his patent. He has placed himself in this condition; we are not responsible, nor the surveyors. For one, I can never vote for this principle.

Mr. EVANS. I understood the Senator from Michigan that the inventor had renewed his patent.

Mr. STUART. The honorable Senator from South Carolina misunderstood me. His patent expired in 1850, and he never renewed it. I stated that the question with him was, whether he would ask and obtain the renewal of his patent, and a patent for the improvement upon it—the effect of which would be to place the Government of the United States, in surveying all these mineral lands, at his mercy; because, that without his instrument the Commissioner of the General Land Office says the lands cannot be surveyed—or whether he would allow the compass to become public, and ask the Government to give him some small compensation for this very great benefit to the Government, stated, as I said, by the Commissioner, to have already exceeded $600,000. I should be very glad, if the thing were left to me, to take a law of Congress authorizing a new patent, rather than to take this sum, or ten times the sum.

The question was taken by yeas and nays; and resulted—yeas 17, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Brown, Cass, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Everett, Foot, Geyer, Hamlin, Jones of Iowa, Seward, Stuart, Sumner, Thomson of New Jersey, Wade, Walker, and Weller—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Dawson, Evans, Fish, Gwin, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Norris, Pettit, Rusk, Sebastian, Shields, Silldell, Thompson of Kentucky, and Williams—15.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. NORRIS objected to its third reading today.

ARMY RETIRED LIST.

The bill to promote the efficiency of the Army by retiring disabled officers, was read a third time; and the question was stated to be, "Shall the bill pass?"

On a division, there were—ayes 21, noes 3—no quorum voting.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Brown, Cass, Dodge of Wisconsin, Evans, Everett, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Geyer, Houston, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Silldell, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Wade, Walker, Weller, and Williams—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Chase, Hamlin, Pettit, and Sumner—5.

The PRESIDENT. There is no quorum voting.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 9, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I received a remonstrance yesterday, purporting to be signed by about three thousand legal voters of New Hampshire, and the day before yesterday another signed by ninety citizens of Londonderry, Rockingham county, New Hampshire, both respectfully and earnestly protesting against any repeal of the prohibition of slavery upon the addition of slave territory to the Union, immediate or prospective, such as is proposed in the Nebraska bill of Senator Douglas.

I ask the unanimous consent of the House that they be received, and laid upon the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object; they can be referred, under the rules.

Mr. DEAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is a resolution upon which there should be immediate action, and to which, I am quite sure, no one will object.

Mr. HENN. I think we had better go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and if that motion be in order I will make it. This is the last day we shall have for the consideration of territorial business, and I am anxious that we should progress as far as possible with that business. If we allow one resolution to be introduced by unanimous consent others will be presented, and a long time will be thus consumed. I object to its introduction.

Mr. DEAN. I ask the gentleman at least to allow the resolution to be read. It relates to a matter of a good deal of importance, and I think the House will concur with me in the opinion that prompt action should be taken upon it.

Mr. WHEELER. I object to the reading, and call for the regular order of business.

Mr. DEAN. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his objection and merely allow the resolution to be read; then if gentleman object to it, I will not press the matter further.

Mr. WHEELER. It is not in order to offer resolutions in this manner, and I think the rule had better be adhered to.

Mr. DEAN. I am quite sure if the gentleman knew the object of the resolution, he would not object to its introduction. I again appeal to him to withdraw his objection.

Mr. WHEELER. I cannot.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. VANSANT. I do not often trouble the House, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois will now indulge me in the request I make, that he will withdraw his motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to enable me to present a memorial from the city of Baltimore, and have it referred.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like very much to accommodate my friend from Maryland; but I would remark to him that he can accomplish his purpose by having his memorial presented under the rule.

Mr. VANSANT. I am aware that I can present the memorial through that channel, but it has been customary to present petitions and memorials coming from the cities and States, and have them referred in open House. I do not often ask favors of the House, and I hope they will indulge me in this. The reasons for having memorials presented in open House coming from such sources is obvious. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. If no objection be made the memorial will be received and referred.

Mr. SAGE. I object. I have my desk full of similar remonstrances, which I cannot get an opportunity to present.

Mr. VANSANT. It is not a remonstrance. It is a memorial from the city of Baltimore. They are resolutions of the Board of Trade of the city of Baltimore, and of citizens of Baltimore, asking for an appropriation of $300,000 for deepening and improving the ship channel of the Patapsco river and the Chesapeake Bay.

The SPEAKER. Objection having been made, the memorial cannot be received. The question is upon the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a question of order. I submit that when I am upon this floor, asking the unanimous consent of the House for a certain purpose, no gentleman has the right to take the floor from me until I have stated that purpose to the House. My resolution is in relation to the rights of citizens of the United States at Havana. The Black Warrior having been seized—

[Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order. The gentleman merely asked the unanimous consent of the House for a certain purpose. He did not present a question of privilege at all; and, in the opinion of the Chair, any member had the right to object, even before he had stated what his purpose was.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now insist upon my motion.

The question was put, and the motion agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being business relating to the organized Territories.

MINNESOTA LAND BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, they had under consideration Senate bill, (No. 38,) entitled "An act to aid the Territory of Minnesota in the construction of a railroad for military, postal, and other purposes."

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PRINGLE] had moved to amend by striking out of the tenth line in the first section the word "alternate."

Debate having been exhausted upon the amendment, the question now is upon its adoption.

Mr. PRINGLE. I offered the amendment now pending; and I should like, with the consent of the committee, to make a brief explanation of the reasons which induced me to offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the amendment has closed, and the gentleman cannot be allowed to proceed.

The question was then put; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to strike out in the seventh line the words "the privilege of extending the same to the northern terminus of the Illinois Central railroad on the Mississippi river."

Mr. HENN. I rise to a point of order. I understand that we had passed through the bill yesterday as far as the third section, and were considering the fourth section when the committee rose?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is mistaken. The committee has not yet passed from the consideration of the first section of the bill, although gentlemen have indicated their intention to offer amendments at other points.

Mr. HENN. I did not so understand it. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, before he offers his amendment, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] yesterday offered an amendment which covered the point at which the gentlemen aims, and that amendment was adopted.

Mr. LETCHER. What was that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, which was adopted yesterday, was to insert in the tenth line the words "in said Territory of Minnesota."

Mr. LETCHER. That does not meet the point at all, as it strikes me. This bill proposes to grant lands to the Territory of Minnesota for a railroad from the mouth of Left Hand river, at the head of Lake Superior, via St. Paul, to the southern line of said Territory, with the privilege of extending the same to the northern terminus of the Illinois Central railroad, on the Mississippi river. With the privilege to whom? Does it not clearly mean with the privilege to the Territory of Minnesota of extending the line to the State of Illinois to the Central railroad? It grants no privilege to the State of Illinois to extend that road through its own territory from the line of Minnesota to the Central railroad. If I understand the language, it grants the privilege to the Territory of Minnesota to extend this line through the territory of an adjacent State. I do not wish to occupy the time of the committee further.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state to the gentleman from Virginia, and to the committee, that the object of the provision to which he refers, and which he wishes to strike out, is to grant the right of way only. I think the bill as it stands secures that right of way. But I am willing that it shall be made to conform explicitly to the statement I have made.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question, with his permission.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Do I understand the gentleman to state that the object of this bill is to give lands between Lake Superior and the Mississippi river, and not beyond St. Paul?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir. I will state to the gentleman that the object of the bill is to grant lands from Lake Superior to St. Paul, and from St. Paul to the southern boundary of Minnesota.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is also intended to grant the right of way down to the other point—the terminus of the Illinois Central railroad.

Mr. LETCHER. To whom do you propose to grant the right of way through the State of Illinois?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is not through the State of Illinois at all, but through the State of Iowa; and the intention is to give the right of way to the Territory of Minnesota, if she builds this road, so that she may connect it with the Illinois Central railroad.

Mr. LETCHER. Do you mean to give the Territory of Minnesota the right of way through the public lands in an adjacent State?

Mr. RICHARDSON. We do.

Mr. LETCHER. What, through the public lands in the State of Illinois?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why certainly.

Mr. LETCHER. If you proposed to give the right of way to the State of Iowa through the public lands within her own borders I could see the force of it; but to give to a Territory the right of way through the public lands in a neighboring State seems to me to be an anomaly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it is a matter of importance enough to be discussed here. I say to the gentleman that the bill proposes to give nothing except what is had under the law now existing.

Mr. LETCHER. Then strike it out.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was in the bill as it came from the Senate, and the Representatives from Iowa, as I understand, desire that it shall be retained.

Mr. COOK. As I understand, the object is to give to Minnesota a grant of land within her territorial boundaries, and to give to that Territory, or to any company which may be established under and by virtue of her laws, the right to run to the northern terminus of the Illinois Central railroad. The proposition which is contained in the first section of this bill, and which authorizes them to go through the public lands for that purpose, does not give to the Territory of Minnesota or any company to be chartered by it, the first acre of land to aid in the construction of the road. It is wished that the bill shall be so shaped that there shall be a terminus at either end of the proposed road in Minnesota; and it is proposed to commence on Lake Superior to run to St. Paul, and thence to the southern boundary of the Territory of Minnesota, or the northern boundary of Iowa; and in order that they may have a connection with another railroad, to give them such privileges as can be granted by the Congress of the United States, to extend their road to the northern terminus of the Illinois Central railroad.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PRINGLE. I move to insert before the word "designated" the words "that is to say those," so that the section will read—

"Every alternate section of land in said Territory of Minnesota, that is to say, those designated by odd numbers," &c.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STUART, of Ohio. I move the following to come in at the end of the first section:

Provided further, That the alternate sections reserved to the United States shall not be open to entry until the railroad herein provided for shall have been located and designated by good and sufficient landmarks, and the route it is to pursue shall have been particularly described in an advertisement to be published three months in all the newspapers selected by the Secretary of the Interior to publish the advertisements of sales of public lands, the cost of such publications to be defrayed by the railroad company.

The object of this amendment is to protect actual settlers. It is known that these corporations have it in their power to run their road by a great many different lines. Two or three different points have been laid over for its route, but they have the privilege of running between these points in any direction through the country. Of course there must be a great many different routes by which these points can be reached. These corporations send out their engineers and surveyors to make their reconnaissance. When the notes are received, the corporations sit down in their offices, compare notes, and determine by themselves which is the best and most eligible route. Do these corporations then publish that route? No such thing. The several corporations have particular friends; to them they confide the knowledge of the route selected, and they and their friends go out and buy up the lands along the line of the proposed railroad. And afterwards, when the route becomes publicly known, all the best land is located.

The amendment which I have offered is designed to protect the interests of actual settlers from such schemes. It is designed to give those persons who desire to purchase land in these regions equal chances with the corporations and their friends. I think, therefore, that the amendment is a proper one; and it is one which I purpose to offer to each one of these bills. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, and I desire to have a vote taken upon it. I implore the committee that, as we have other bills which it is important to have passed, they will vote at once upon this bill, and get it out of the way of the others. Let it be either defeated or passed.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I desire to make a remark upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STUART.]

The CHAIRMAN. Further debate is not in order upon it.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I simply wish to state to the committee that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is not necessary. I desire to state to the gentleman from Ohio that the Senate bill, which has been reported to the House some days ago, had for its object the protection of the actual settlers within the line of the section of these railroads. And if the object of the gentleman's amendment was simply to secure to the actual settler the right to make his location, I would say to him that that right will be protected by the Senate bill, when it shall have been acted upon by this House. That bill is of a general, not special, character. It applies to all locations of railroads to which grants have been or may be made. Being of this general character, it would be better to pass it, and thus to establish the principle of it than to be at the trouble of making an amendment of the same character for every bill of that kind which may come up for our consideration.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STUART,] and the Chairman announced that the vote appeared to be in the negative.

Several MEMBERS. Divide, divide.

Mr. ORR. I propose to amend that amendment by striking out the last clause of it. The effect, Mr. Chairman, if I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, would be this: It would have the effect of preventing any of the lands being brought into market—it may be, for an unlimited period of time. This bill, if passed, allows the Territory of Minnesota a period of ten years to construct a railroad. Now, suppose that the Territory of Minnesota do not incorporate a railroad company, or suppose that a railroad company, if incorporated, do not locate the road for the period of seven years; are you by the adoption of this amendment—for such would be the effect of it—to prevent any location of lands within the Territory for that length of time? I repeat, this would be the effect of the proposition. I therefore oppose that amendment; and I now ask the unanimous consent of the committee to withdraw my amendment to it.

There being no objection, the amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

The question then recurred on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STUART,] and, on a division, it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to report the second section of the bill.

The second section was accordingly read:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sections and parts of sections of land which, by such grant, shall remain to the United States, within six miles on each side of said road, shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of the public lands when sold; nor shall any of such lands become subject to private entry until the same have been first offered at public sale at the increased price.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out that section. The effect of it will be, if adopted, to leave the remaining sections in the possession of the Government at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, which I think is nothing but right.

If the Government is to give away this land, let her look for remuneration to the transportation of her property, her troops, and her mails, and not get an equivalent for the land she gives in the enhanced price of the land retained, and then require this service in addition.

Again, sir, this section proposes to double the price upon all the land reserved within six miles of the road. I suppose it is fair to infer, that if the land along the route of the road will be enhanced in value by the construction of the road, the land also within six and a half, seven, eight, and perhaps ten miles from the road, will also be increased in value; and where the odd sections within the six miles have been sold by the Government, or have been disposed of by preemption rights, then they are to take an equivalent amount of land beyond the six miles from the road, but not to exceed fifteen miles, I believe. Now, I think it will be nothing but right to strike that section out, and leave the remaining lands at the minimum price.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and desire a vote upon it.

The question was then taken; and the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk then read the third section, as follows:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said lands, hereby granted to the said Territory shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature thereof, for the purposes aforesaid and no other; and the said railroad shall be and remain a public highway, for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States."

Mr. DEAN. I send to the Clerk an amendment to that section, and I ask the committee to listen to its reading, as it is designed to carry out the object of the bill, as set forth by its friends.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the third section the words:

—forever. And in case of neglect or refusal on the part of said railroad, or the persons having charge thereof, to transport said troops and property free of charge, the locomotives, cars, machinery, and persons employed in operating the same, shall at all times be subject to the order of the Secretary of War, or person in command of any troops or property of the United States, which said Secretary or person in command may deem necessary to be transported on said road: Provided, That as soon as said troops and property shall have been transported, said road, locomotives, cars, machinery, and persons shall be immediately surrendered by the person taking possession thereof.

Mr. DEAN. It is said that the object of this third section is to secure the transportation of the Government troops, munitions of war, and whatever may be necessary therefor, free of cost. Now, if I understand that section, it does not give the Government that privilege. It merely makes the railroad a highway, and when the troops and property of the Government reaches that point for the purpose of transportation, suppose the company should say to the Government officers: "There is the railroad, but we will not let you have the cars or the locomotives—"

Mr. BISSELL, (interrupting.) We will then impress them.

Mr. DEAN. The gentleman says we will impress them. What would be the result of such a course? You will have, for years and years, agents here swarming around the Capitol, pressing claims upon Congress for damages from impressing them.

I do not want to consume the time of the committee in discussing this matter; but I ask, that the gentlemen who favor this bill should so frame it as to secure to the Government the right of having their troops and property transported, and make the company or the State responsible for not doing it by pecuniary penalties, or else put it into the hands of the officers of the Government, so that no claim can be brought against the Government for taking possession of the road. This amendment effects the object by giving to the person in command of the troops the power to take possession of the locomotives and other property of the road, for the purpose of transporting the same; and provides that as soon as they are transported over the road, everything which has been thus taken shall be surrendered to the company.

Mr. BISSELL. How shall we have the power and authority to do it?

Mr. DEAN. We now own the land, and if we give it to them we have a right to annex a condition to the grant.

Mr. BISSELL. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, but I do not wish to occupy the time of the committee in discussing it. I do not think that either the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Interior desires to be constituted a superintendent of the road. Besides that, I think, when the time comes that we shall want to transport the mails, troops, and munitions of the United States over the road, that we shall do it in spite of the company. I see that there is a provision in the bill which will exempt us from all liability to pay for it too. I think it would be worse than useless to regulate in this general bill the details of these matters.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DEAN's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I offer the following amendment, to insert after the word "any," at the end of the sixth line, in the third section, the word "mails," so that it will then read:

"Free from all toll or other charge upon the transportation of any mails, property, or troops of the United States."

I think if we furnish the means to build the road, that we certainly ought to have the mails as well as property and troops of the United States carried upon this road free of charge for all time to come, at least so long as the road shall exist. I think it would be but a small remuneration upon the part of those who own the road to carry the mails as well as the troops and other property of the country for this donation of land.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is the usual provision as to the transportation of the mails in the fifth section of the bill. The gentleman from Tennessee insists that they shall carry the mails free of charge. We leave it to the Government of the United States to determine what they shall pay for such transportation. It is in their power to do as they please in regard to this matter. I oppose the amendment.

The question was then put upon Mr. JONES's amendment.

Mr. JONES demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. KERR, and HARRIS of Alabama, were appointed.

The question was then put; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 68; no quorum voting.

[Cries of "Recount!"]

Mr. OLDS. I insist upon a call of the roll.

The CHAIRMAN. The rules of the House require that the roll shall be called whenever the committee finds itself without a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was then called. The committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. PHELPS] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had according to order the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill (No. 138) proposing a grant of land to Minnesota to aid in the construction of a railroad therein; and having found itself without a quorum had caused the roll to be called, and had directed him to report the facts to the House, with the names of the absentees.

The following is the list of absentees:

Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barry, Belcher, Bell, Bennett, Benton, Bliss, Brooks, Chamberlain, Churchill, Colquitt, Cumming, Curtis, Cutting, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Drum, Dunham, Elliott, Etheridge, Fenton, Flagler, Franklin, Gamble, Aaron Harlan, Hillyer, Hunt, Lamb, Latham, Lilly, Lyon, McNair, McQueen, Mace, Maxwell, May, Noble, Packer, Parker, Peck, Pennington, Powell, Preston, Rowe, Ruffin, Sapp, Scudder, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Solters, Frederick P. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Straub, David Stuart, John J. Taylor, Walker, Walsh, John Wentworth, Witte, and Yates.

A quorum having answered to their names, the committee again resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee found itself without a quorum, the pending amendment was that offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] upon which tellers were ordered.

Mr. MILLER, of Missouri. I move to amend that amendment by inserting after the word "mail" the words "including letters only." I am sure the committee cannot have understood the question presented by the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, or they would promptly have voted it down; and I offer this amendment for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the section under consideration. By that section it is declared that the railroad shall remain a public highway for the use of the United States, free from toll or charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States. The fifth section of the bill provides that the United States mails shall be transported over said railroad, under the direction of the Post Office Department, at such price as Congress may by law direct.

Now, sir, the provisions of this bill are just such as have been incorporated in all bills granting lands to States for railroad purposes, and it would truly be onerous on any railroad company to require them to transport the United States mail free of cost, in addition to the transportation of the troops, munitions of war, and other property belonging to the Government. We think that the Government is amply remunerated when its property is transported, and the reserved sections are so much enhanced in value. I think the friends of the bill must at once see that no railroad company would undertake the transportation of the mails free of cost, in addition to the other duties imposed on them by this bill, and I hope, therefore, that the committee will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BISSELL. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, and also to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. I know no reason why we may not trust to future Congresses to decide how much this railroad shall receive, or whether it shall receive anything, for transporting the mails; and I think that it is requiring entirely too much to impose upon them, in advance, the duty, without limitation, without regard to circumstances, and without pay or remuneration, of transporting the mails of the Government over this road.

I am fully impressed with the belief that no gentleman will, on reflection, vote for the amendment, who is not opposed out and out to grants of this nature. It does seem to me that only those who are opposed upon general grounds to the making of such grants can favor this amendment. I ask again if we cannot trust to future Congresses to fix the compensation which this road shall receive for carrying the mails? We cannot tell how much or how little the service may be worth ten, fifteen, thirty, or a hundred years hence. It would, therefore, be better to leave these little matters of detail to future Congresses, as has been done in former acts of this kind. This is a new feature in bills of this description. It has been sprung suddenly upon us here, and I apprehend that few gentlemen have bestowed much reflection upon it, because they have not had time to do so. I am very sure that it will detract greatly from, if it does not entirely destroy, the advantages anticipated from this bill.

It is no small matter, but a very grave one, when you consider that it is without limit as to time, without limit as to circumstances, conditions, or any matters which may influence the transportation upon that road for centuries to come.

Now, it seems to me, that the proposer of that amendment has gone on the principle that we are making a gift to a company here without indemnification, without any consideration, and have a right to impose just such conditions as we please. That right we have unquestionably, but are we receiving nothing in return? Is this a transaction the advantages of which are altogether on one side? Why, have not the individuals who build this road to expend days and nights of toil, to risk their means, their credit, all that they have for many years, before they can derive any advantages whatever from the land that you propose to donate to them?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then taken on Mr. MILLER's amendment, and it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] When the committee was in the act of dividing on it by tellers, it found itself without a quorum. The tellers will again resume their places.

Messrs. HARRIS, of Alabama, and KERR resumed their places as tellers.

The question was again taken, and the amendment was rejected; the tellers having reported—ayes 63, noes 71.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to report the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have an amendment to the third section, which I now wish to offer.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object to it. An amendment to that section is not now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment proposed to be offered by the gentleman from New York is in time, as the committee has not yet commenced the consideration of the fourth section of the bill.

The amendment was then reported, as follows: In section third, in the third line, after the word "thereof," insert the words "to actual settlers only, and at a price not exceeding one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to obviate one of the greatest difficulties which I have to these railroad schemes. I am opposed to the principle of placing in the hands of railroad companies so large a part of our public domain, to be held by them as a monopoly; and the object of this amendment is to secure the settlement and sale of these lands, which are donated to actual settlers only.

The question was then put on the amendment; which was not agreed to.

Mr. KERR. I beg to offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the third section:

Provided, however, That the money arising from the sales of the reserved sections shall be paid over to those States which have received no grant of the public lands for internal improvements, according to their Federal representation in Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will state his question of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My point of order is this: that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR] is not germane to the question under consideration, and therefore is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina is not germane to the matter under consideration; nor is it in accordance with the order of the House that this committee do proceed to the consideration of local territorial business in the organized Territories.

Mr. KERR. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. To the decision of the Chair, that the amendment is not in order, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR] appeals.

Mr. LETCHER. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair, for the purpose of obtaining information.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not intend to debate it, but only to put an interrogatory to the Chair. This bill, as I understand it, makes a donation of alternate sections for—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must inform the gentleman that he is out of order. But one point of order can be under debate at a time. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR] submitted the amendment which has just been read. The Chair decided that it was not in order, as being not germane to the business under consideration, and as not being within the special order of the House, which confined the committee to the consideration of business for the organized Territories. From that decision the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR] takes an appeal, and the question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KERR and OLDS appointed.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to know what the question is under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. It is upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SEWARD. Certainly; but I desire to know upon what that appeal was taken?

The CHAIRMAN. It was taken upon a decision of the Chair that an amendment, which will be read, was not in order.

The amendment was again reported by the Clerk.

Mr. SEWARD. That is the amendment, but I wish to inquire what the main question is?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the bill which the committee have under consideration, being Senate bill (No. 138) to aid the Territory of Minnesota in constructing a railroad for military, postal, and other purposes. The question is upon the appeal.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 84.

So the appeal was sustained; and the decision of the Chair overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KERR. I have no disposition to detain the committee with any remarks. I have only this to say, that if gentlemen have any disposition whatever to extend justice to the old States of this Union they will now have an opportunity of manifesting it. Gentlemen have told us again and again that this system of granting alternate sections of land was beneficial to the whole country, and that it was not at all partial in its operation. This is the first opportunity which has presented itself of testing the question. If, in fact, it be a system by which alternate sections of lands are doubled in value, then just satisfy the country of that, and give to that portion of the country which is not interested in these local plans of improvement the benefit of these alternate sections, and we will have no controversy in Congress about this matter; but shall have all sections of the country united in voting to appropriate lands for any such works as the one we now have before us, and for other works which are intended to benefit the country generally.

Mr. DEAN. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. KERR,] for he reason that it is a scheme for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, which has been held by the Democratic party, and by the country generally, to be a violation of the Constitution. I am opposed to the bill upon another ground. The gentleman from North Carolina has stated as his ground for offering his amendment that the old States need something. The old States of this Confederacy are not here asking alms from the General Government. They do not need it. If they cannot support themselves by their own resources, let them go into bankruptcy. The State of New York asks for nothing of this kind. Nor ought any of the old States to ask for anything, as a gift, from this Government. I was born in one of the old States, and I expect always to live there, and I sincerely hope that the day will never come when she shall come here and ask the General Government that the proceeds of the public lands shall be divided among all the States. I am opposed to the amendment, and I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. WHEELER. I deny that the gentleman has the right to speak for the State of New York. I desire to know by what authority my colleague from the Kinderhook district speaks for the State of New York? I am aware that the gentleman has the Administration in his charge, as well as the interests of the Kinderhook district, but the State of New York has thirty-two representatives besides himself to speak for her. When she desires the gentleman from Kinderhook district to speak for her alone she will probably notify him of the fact.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to offer the following amendment: Strike out the words "over to those States which have received no grant of of the public lands for internal improvements," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"To all the States respectively for the purposes of internal improvements and education, according to their Federal representation in Congress."

Mr. KERR. I ask that the amendment may be reported at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR. The only objection, Mr. Chairman, I have to the amendment of my friend from North Carolina is, that it seems to provide for a somewhat partial distribution of this common fund of the nation. The amount received from the sale of these alternate sections of land reserved by the Government along the lines of railroad in Missouri, in Illinois, in Minnesota, in Wisconsin, or wherever reserved, goes into the General Treasury, and should redound to the benefit of all the States alike, in proportion to their Federal representation; and, for one, I have no objection to making it operate for the benefit of all. It is but carrying out a portion of the creed of the Whig party of the country, advocated with so much zeal and ability by the distinguished statesman from Kentucky [Mr. Clay] several years since, to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, in proportion to their Federal representation, for the great purposes of education and internal improvements, which was partially carried into effect for the benefit of the country.

Now, sir, if the amendment of my friend from North Carolina be adopted without modification, it will provide for partial legislation; it will be dividing among a portion of the States of the Union the common fund of the nation raised by the sales of these alternate sections, and received into the general Treasury. I desire, if this fund is to be distributed among the States, that it shall be distributed among them all in proportion to their Federal representation in this Capitol, for the great purposes of internal improvement and education. Such policy was in former times advocated by the Whig party of the country, and I am proud to have advocated it.

In my opinion, this plan for the equitable distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands was one most beneficial in its effects, so far as it was carried out. It would have been, if fully carried into effect, one of the most beneficial measures ever presented for the consideration of the American people. And as a majority of the representatives in Congress saw fit to abandon the policy, it was no fault of the Whig party of the country.

The amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina is good, so far as it goes; but as I have no desire to do injustice to any State in the Union, I would much prefer that it should be so modified or extended as to embrace all the States in the policy of distributing the proceeds of the sales of these alternate sections, and that the proceeds of those reserved alternate sections should be applied to promote objects of internal improvement and education, under the direction of the Legislatures of the several States.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TAYLOR. Not now. I am aware that I am probably calling up old reminiscences in the mind of the gentleman from North Carolina of the time when, upon this floor, and upon the stump, we advocated this policy. I am very free to admit that I have made many speeches in support of it. It went partially into effect, and, as I think, with great benefit to the country. It was advocated by Mr. Clay with distinguished ability, and was partially advocated, or at least suggested, by General Jackson to the country. And I repeat, that so far as it went into operation, it proved beneficial to the whole country. I know it did in the section of country which I have the honor to represent. If the amendment of my friend from North Carolina be adopted, I hope it will be in such a manner as to make the distribution equitable among all portions of the Confederacy.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I like the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio very well; but there is one portion of it that does not meet my approbation, and which I think will probably weaken the proposition. I am perfectly willing that this money shall be distributed among all the States in proportion to their Federal representation.

I object, however, to the limitation that the proceeds of these lands shall be expended for the purposes of education and internal improvement. I have very great doubts about the right of the General Government to control the States, or to make use of the States as agents for education or internal improvement. I have difficulties upon that point. I have no doubt the donation would be used for those purposes, and I desire that it should be used in that way; but I hope that my friend from Ohio will modify his amendment so as simply to make this money divisible among all the States according to their Federal population. I will vote for it, in that event, but I object to designating how they shall spend the money. If any States wish to apply the money to the payment of their honest debts, let them do it. My object is that the Government shall not seem to control the States in local matters.

My colleague on my left [Mr. KERR] tells me that if the gentleman from Ohio will modify his amendment in the way I have suggested, he will accept it. I think this is a much better way to dispose of the public lands than to vote them away, as the homestead bill does. I would much rather see some important public works, that will really be beneficial to the public, carried out, than to have the public lands donated away so as to reduce the value of the lands to almost nothing, without, I think, really benefiting the paupers of the country for whom they are mainly intended. I would much rather that the proceeds of the public lands should remain in the public Treasury for the support of the Government, so as to enable us to reduce the taxes. But if the question arises between the two policies, I prefer this one—the proceeds of the reserved alternate sections being divided among the States—to having the public domain squandered away by homestead bills to enable gentlemen to make a little Buncombe here, and perhaps to get sent back to Congress on the idea that they are very benevolent with other people's property.

I hope, therefore, that my friend from Ohio will consent to the modification I have suggested. I am willing that the old and the new States shall come in together as a compromise.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR. I have no objection to modify my amendment, by inserting after the words "internal improvement," the words "and for such other purposes as the States may desire."

Mr. CLINGMAN. Oh, no; that will not meet my views.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then I will let my amendment stand as it is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I call for a division of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You cannot divide it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. KERR.]

Mr. WASHBURN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment which contains two propositions, and I want a division of them.

The CHAIRMAN. What division does the gentleman desire?

Mr. WASHBURN. The first proposition embraces a distribution of the proceeds of these lands among all the States.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You cannot divide the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN. That is one distinct proposition, but there is another which limits the manner in which those proceeds shall be applied by the States.

Mr. DISNEY. Suppose you vote down the first proposition, what is left?

Mr. TAYLOR. It is certainly only one amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And it cannot be divided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand what division the gentleman from Maine proposes. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is to strike out a portion of the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, and to insert certain words. Does the gentleman wish for a division on striking out?

Mr. WASHBURN. No, sir. I will withdraw my call for a division of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. Let it be read.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. TAYLOR, and it was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on Mr. KERR's amendment.

Mr. OLDS. I propose to add, as an addition to the amendment, the following:

"To be divided, per capita, among the inhabitants of said States."

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the system of my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] to divide the proceeds of the sales of the public land among the States for the purpose of internal improvement. If they are to be divided among the States at all, they should be divided among the people, the inhabitants. I hold that every man, or one man as much as another, is entitled to the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, if they are to be divided. If they are to be appropriated to pay the interest on the debts of the States, or for works of internal improvement, they are not then divided to every man per capita, but to the men of the State in proportion to their wealth, and in proportion to the taxes they pay. The very system of my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] proposes, that every man shall receive the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in proportion to his wealth. Now, we did not acquire them in that way. Those acquired by purchase were paid for under the operation of a tariff, by which every man pays in proportion to the consumption and the number of his family, and not in proportion to his wealth. And if you are to divide the proceeds of their sale, they should be divided per capita, and not in proportion to the wealth of the inhabitants of the States.

I am opposed to this whole system of a division of the lands, or the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States; but if they are to be divided at all, let each inhabitant of the States receive his due portion—the rich as well as the poor; and then you will do something which has the appearance, at least, of justice.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he did not vote for the homestead bill the other day?

Mr. OLDS. I am very glad to inform the gentleman from Virginia that I did vote for it.

Mr. SMITH. And you voted to give the wealthy man the same rights under it as the poor man?

Mr. OLDS. And so I propose here. I move a division per capita, to the rich man equally with the poor man. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. As it is well known, Mr. Chairman, the understanding was originally that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands should go into the Federal Treasury for the purpose of defraying the common charge and expenditure. This committee have seen how they have been wasted. The gentleman submits a scheme to hang a speech upon, which is utterly impracticable, as we know.

I understand that the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina is this, and nothing more: To give to the States which have none a portion of the lands. If you give to the State in which a road is to be built one half of the public land, why, the balance certainly can very properly be divided, under this principle, among the different States. And those States, certainly, will know how to dispose of them as well as any person here. Yes, sir, this gentleman is destroying the interposition of the Government. He is running the thing literally into the ground. I hope those who are in favor of fair play will give the gentleman from North Carolina the opportunity of carrying out his proposition. Let us vote down the amendments to his amendment, and see whether the committee is prepared to sustain it. I trust that those who are disposed to see this principle tested will throw aside all these amendments, and take the naked proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. I ask for the reading of the 40th rule, with a view of determining who has a right to vote on this question.

The Clerk then read the 40th rule, as follows:

"No member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested, or in any case when he was not within the bar of the House when the question was put."

Mr. STANTON. Allow me to make a remark or two in reference to this matter.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit me to ask a question?

Mr. STANTON yielded the floor.

Mr. JONES. I wish to make one inquiry; which is, whether this 40th rule was read or announced when the vote was taken on the passage of the Senate resolution to distribute books to members?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not for the Chair to decide what member is or is not interested in the matter. That is a question which every member of the committee must decide for himself.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, which was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. KERR.]

Mr. MATTESON. I move to amend that amendment by inserting the words "one half," which would make the amendment read that one half of the money arising from the sales of the reserved sections shall be paid over to those States which have received no grant of the public lands, according to their Federal representation in Congress. I move this amendment, for the purpose only of asking a question.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment offered, and send to the Clerk the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk reported the following amendment:

Insert at the end of the third section as follows: Provided, however, That the money arising from the sales of the reserved sections shall be paid over to the States according to their representation in Congress.

Mr. MATTESON. I rise, Mr. Chairman, as well for the purpose of offering that amendment to the amendment, as for the purpose of asking my honorable colleague [Mr. DEAN] by what authority he informs this House and the country that the State of New York will not ask, nor will she receive, her portion of the public domain?

Mr. DEAN. I will answer that question—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield the floor to his colleague?

Mr. MATTESON. With great pleasure; as I want my question answered.

Mr. DEAN. I am very glad, Mr. Chairman, of the opportunity that I have of replying to the question of my colleague. I say that the State of New York does not want any of the proceeds of the public lands; and I say so on the authority of the people of New York, as expressed at the ballot-box. For, when General Jackson announced his doctrine—

[Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" and laughter over the House.]

Mr. DEAN. The State of New York supported that doctrine.

[Renewed laughter and interruption.]

Mr. COBB. Let the gentleman from New York continue his remarks; he has got another point, perhaps.

Mr. DEAN. I say on another point, that the State of New York does not want any of the proceeds of the public lands. The people of the State of New York mean to abide by the Constitution. The Constitution gives Congress no power to distribute the public lands in this way; and the people of the State of New York are resolved not to violate the Constitution.

Mr. MATTESON. And that is all? General Jackson, eh! That will do. [Laughter.]

And so General Jackson's fame is to be raked up here to sustain the position of the gentleman. Now, I tell my colleague that he may represent a portion of the State of New York at the other end of this avenue, but he does not represent all of it on this floor on this question, and has no right to speak for the whole State. I refer to the political character of the Legislature of the State of New York at this time, to learn what the position of the people of that State is on this question.

Mr. DEAN. They are no authority upon it.

Mr. MATTESON. I ask my colleague whether he does not know that the Canal Board of the State of New York, within a short time, has resolved to apply to Congress for a portion of the proceeds of the public lands?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will state his question of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My point of order is, that this discussion is not pertinent to the question before the committee.

Mr. MATTESON. Well, I know it is not strictly pertinent. [Laughter.] I understand that, but many impertinent things are said in this Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York must confine his remarks to the amendment he has offered.

Mr. MATTESON. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DEAN. Will my colleague permit me—

Mr. MATTESON. My colleague will excuse me. I cannot be interrupted any more.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, to say that at this time the State of New York has two great works in contemplation, and for which she would like to receive what honestly and fairly belongs to her of the public lands. I speak of the ship canal around the Falls of Niagara, a national work in its character, although the whole of its construction will be within the limits of the State of New York; and of the enlargement of the Erie canal, in its character also a national work, in which the West as well as the East has, if possible, a deeper interest than the State of New York. I say to this House and the country, without the fear of contradiction, that New York does want, and does ask, for her fair share of the public domain.

I wish also to say that I am not opposed to railroad grants, when fairly made and properly guarded. I voted for the Illinois grant, and have never seen cause to regret it; and I am also in favor of giving the proceeds of the remaining alternate sections not granted to the railroads to the States for the purposes indicated, to whom I think they fairly belong.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. I rise to state that New York does desire her share of the proceeds of the public lands; that she has evinced it during a Democratic Administration, when the deposit fund was tendered to the country, and a portion of it, which was to go to the State of New York, was suspended, and that State came forward and borrowed the money to carry out the original appropriation for—

Mr. DEAN, (interrupting.) And lost the whole of it.

Mr. PERKINS. Not one dollar or one cent. The gentleman, if he knows anything of the history of the State of New York—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must inform the gentleman that he is entitled to speak only in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to be permitted to proceed with what I have to say.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have a duty to perform, and I mean to perform it. I ask that the gentleman from New York shall be confined to the question in debate before the House. And while I am upon the floor, I appeal to the committee to proceed with the business legitimately before them. We have this territorial business to dispose of, and if the latitude which has been taken in this debate is to be allowed, this business, so much needed to be passed, must go over.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York must confine himself to speaking in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I am nearly through. All I have to say is, not in advocacy of this bill particularly, but in reference to the State of New York; that by her acceptance of that deposit fund she has shown her disposition to take her share of the public money, and to retain it. When there was a difficulty in getting her share of the deposit fund, by its payment being suspended—and which she hoped to appropriate to school purposes—she borrowed the amount to carry on her school system.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Did I understand the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR] as accepting the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MATTESON?]

The CHAIRMAN. It was not accepted; and the question now recurs upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MATTESON. I ask for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MATTESON and FAULKNER appointed.

The question was then put; and there being a disagreement in the count of the tellers—

Mr. BOCOCK demanded another count.

The CHAIRMAN. As there seems to be some discrepancy in the count, the tellers will again resume their places.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I want to know whether the tellers both voted upon the same side of the question? If they did, I ask that one of them may be changed, and one in favor of the opposite side be appointed in his place.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know how the tellers themselves voted. He only knows the fact that they did not agree in their report, and he therefore decides that the question must be again taken.

The question was again put; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 86.

So the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. KERR's amendment.

Mr. ENGLISH. I offer the following as an amendment to the amendment:

But no portion of the proceeds of such reserved sections shall be distributed to any State which has heretofore had the benefit of appropriations of money out of the United States Treasury for the improvement of rivers or harbors, or the support of light-houses, or other Government improvements, within or on the borders of said State.

All I have to say in support of this amendment is, that if accounts are to be opened by the General Government with the States of this Union, I want those States which have been benefited by appropriations of money to be charged with the amount. Why should not the States benefited by appropriations of money be excluded as well as those in whose favor grants of land have been made? The amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR] I consider makes an unjust discrimination between the States. It excludes Indiana, and most of the western States, from enjoying any portion of the proceeds of these reserved sections, giving the entire proceeds to the old States, where millions are annually appropriated from the United States Treasury to support light-houses, improve harbors, &c. If any such proposition is to pass, I want the books posted, and the balance struck to each State. Let us have justice and equality.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman talks about opening up accounts among the States. Why, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. DISNEY] announced the other day that accounts were already opened, and that among all these new States the accounts were to be balanced by giving to those that had not already received as much enough to make them equal with the State of Illinois. Now, whenever it is proposed here to do anything calculated to equalize the use of these public lands gentlemen talk about opening up accounts; but when a question comes up between two of these land States with regard to their internal improvement schemes, and it is openly avowed on this floor that accounts have been opened and that they have even determined on the manner of balancing those accounts, why it is passed by without a word from any of these gentlemen who are after the lands.

The question was then taken on Mr. ENGLISH's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina by striking out all after the word "sales," and inserting in lieu thereof the words:

—of the public lands shall be distributed among the States respectively, according to their Federal representation.

So as to make it read:

Provided, however, That the money received from the sales of the public lands shall be distributed among the States respectively, according to their Federal representation."

Several MEMBERS. That is the same thing.

Mr. TAYLOR. The proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina only refers, as I understand it, to the alternate sections of the public lands reserved along the lines of the railroads to which grants are made, and the amendments proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MATTHEWSON] and myself only looked to those reserved sections.

Now, it seems to me that when we are legislating on a matter of so much importance as this, we ought to extend this principle to the whole of the public lands, and do justice to the old States. I wish to do the old States of this Union ample justice, and if you carry out this great principle of a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States in proportion to their Federal numbers, you will do most exact justice to those States; and if that had been done long since they would have no reason now to complain of any injustice at our hands. I do not think it would be fair to pay over the proceeds of the reserved sections along all these lines of railroad to such States only as have heretofore received no grants for internal improvements. Where would you draw the line?

In looking over the distribution of the lands donated to the various land States, under the name of swamp lands, I find that the State which I have the honor in part to represent received the small quantity of twenty-five thousand acres, which, after paying for the reclamation of the swamp lands within its limits, have now become the most valuable of the land there; whereas, Louisiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Michigan have received some four, five, six, or even nine millions of acres.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman allow me to state how that was?

Mr. TAYLOR. I cannot yield to the gentleman; my time is so limited. I propose to carry out the principle which I advocated two years ago. I wish to propose it in a plain, frank, and manly way, and say to the States of the Union: after we have made donations for military services—after we have given the States certain lands under the operation of the swamp land act—after we have made grants for certain lines of railroads—that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands may be distributed among the States of this Union equitably, and in proportion to their Federal representation. Is not that fair? Is it not honest? Is it not the most equitable distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands that can be devised? If not, I should be glad to be informed how you could make a better distribution? I wish to do justice to the old States; and I wish I had time now to express my opinion of the bill introduced by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT], at the last Congress, and which passed this body. It is one of the most important, and equitable, and grand schemes ever presented to the country. It was lost no doubt in the Senate for want of time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am opposed to the amendment as well as the original proposition. I do not desire to consume time in its discussion. It is important that we should act upon this matter in one way or the other. I am disposed to urge the committee to a vote.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Permit me to say that the Delegate from Minnesota [Mr. RICE] is here. There are other measures of vast importance to that Territory before the committee; and, unless we pass this bill to-night, he will not have an opportunity to bring them to our consideration.

[Cries of "Order!"]

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. COBB. If the committee had been disposed to strike out the words "internal improvements," I should not have offered my amendment. If gentlemen are in good earnest I want them to act fairly. I move the following as addition.

Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall be so construed as not to embrace Alabama as one of the States receiving grants for internal improvements.

Mr. Chairman, if the committee intend to pass the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina I desire to have that exception made. Alabama, it is true, asks something, as appears by the various bills she has presented to this body; but she has not yet obtained it. And suppose the amendment of the gentleman passes, does he pretend to exclude Alabama from a fair participation in the proceeds of the sales of the reserved sections?

Mr. DENT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama a simple question. Did not the State of Alabama receive five or six hundred thousand acres of public lands under a grant to her?

Mr. COBB. I shall answer, before I conclude, the inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia. The State of Alabama did receive, when she was admitted into the Union, five hundred thousand acres of public lands. But for what purpose? For the purpose of internal improvement. What did she do with these five hundred thousand acres of land? Did she apply it exclusively to promote the interests of the State of Alabama? Or did she expend four hundred thousand out of the grant in improving the Muscle Shoals on the Tennessee river, where five, six, or seven States were directly interested in the improvement? The State of Alabama thus disposed of the land which she received. True, she has received a little land on the line of the Mobile and Ohio railroad. But how much? is the question. She received two hundred and nineteen thousand acres. Are you, then, in earnest about this amendment? Will you say that the State of Alabama shall be excluded, because she has received this small quantity of land? If so, go on with the deed of injustice which has been perpetrated on that State since the distribution of the public lands has been commenced.

Sir, we have been knocking at the door of Congress. We have now the second railroad bill that was ever offered in the Congress of the United States, and which is now pending in the House. Has she been heard in response to her demand or her application? She has not. And if you are determined to refuse her the grants which she is now asking, I ask you at least to do justice to the State of Alabama, and put my amendment—designed to protect her interests—on the same footing with the General Government on which you propose to put your own beloved and always protected States.

Mr. HAMILTON. I know the gentleman from Alabama is not in earnest.

Mr. COBB. I am in earnest.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman never desires to exclude the State of Alabama from the participation in any appropriation.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. KERR], tellers were demanded, and ordered, and Messrs. WRIGHT and RICHARDSON were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 61.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER, of New York. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the third section:

And said railroad shall carry and transport free from toll, or other charge, any property or troops of the United States at any time when required so to do.

The third section provides that this road shall remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or charge. Now, for all practical purposes that right is useless to the Government. To carry out what I suppose to be one of the inducements held out for the purpose of securing the passage of this bill, I propose the amendment which I have offered.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the amendment; and it was decided in the affirmative.

No further amendments being offered to the third section, the Clerk proceeded to read the fourth section, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted to said Territory shall be disposed of by said Territory only in manner following, that is to say: that a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections, and included within a continuous length of twenty miles of said road may be sold; and when the Governor of said Territory shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any continuous twenty miles of said road is completed, then another like quantity of land hereby granted may be sold; and so from time to time until said road is completed; and if said road is not completed within ten years, no further sales shall be made, and the land unsold shall revert to the United States."

Mr. ORR. I desire to offer the following as a substitute for the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. ORR. If the gentleman from Maine will listen to the reading of the amendment I offer, I think he will find that it embraces the object which he has in view.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted to said Territory shall be disposed of only in manner following, that is to say, no title shall vest in the said Territory of Minnesota, nor shall any patent issue for any part of the lands herein before mentioned, until a continuous length of twenty miles of said road shall be completed through the lands hereby granted, and when the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that any twenty continuous miles of said road are completed, then a patent shall issue for a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections, included within a continuous length of twenty miles of said road, and from time to time patents shall be issued in like manner upon the completion of each additional twenty miles of said road until it shall be completed, when patents shall issue for the remaining lands not already conveyed; and if said road is not completed within ten years, no further sales shall be made, and the lands so remaining shall revert to the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN. The amendment of the gentleman embraces a portion of my amendment, but not the whole of it. I desire, therefore, to have the amendment which I hold in my hands considered by the committee before the substitute is adopted. I wish to offer it as an additional section, to come in after the fourth section.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order at present.

Mr. ORR. The amendment which I have suggested is the amendment that was proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] yesterday.

Mr. WASHBURN. I would ask the gentleman from South Carolina if it embraces the whole amendment? I understand that it does not, and that it leaves out a material portion of the amendment. I ask the gentleman if he will include the portion left out?

Mr. ORR. Will the gentleman suggest what portion?

Mr. WASHBURN. It is this:

"Until patents shall be issued therefor, the title to said lands shall not vest in said Territory; no patent shall issue for any part of said lands until said Territory shall in due form assent to the provisions of this act, and shall agree to fulfill the same."

Mr. ORR. If the gentleman will examine the amendment I have offered, he will find that I have changed the phraseology used by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CURTIS], so as to provide in the first line of my amendment, that the title shall not vest in the Territory of Minnesota until the conditions named in it are complied with. The phraseology I have used is better, and on that account I introduced it at the commencement rather than at the end of the amendment. The effect of this amendment will be to secure the Government against loss in any contingency whatever. The amendment requires that twenty miles of the road shall actually be finished, and that that fact shall be certified to by the Secretary of the Interior before he shall execute patents for a single acre of land. When he is advertised of that fact, then he issues patents for twenty miles. The company then proceed to build another twenty miles of the railroad; and when it is finished, then the Secretary of the Interior issues patents for twenty other miles.

The effect of the amendment I have offered is to save the Government from any possible contingent loss. As the section now stands, this difficulty might occur under it, and it is an objection which I suggested the other day. They might dispose of these sections along the first twenty miles, as they would have a right to do, and the title would be good in the purchasers; but yet, after making that disposition, they might fail to make the road, so that the State government will get the land along twenty miles of the road, and the Government will have security that whenever the land is taken the road will be built. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DISNEY. The gentleman from South Carolina has explained the precise effect of his amendment. By the construction given to the bill as it now stands, or to just such bills, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and which construction is sustained by the courts of the country, no title can be given to the States in which the railroad is to be constructed to more than twenty miles of continuous lands at a time. That is a condition precedent in the grant. The only question, then, which is presented by the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina is, whether we shall trust the State or Territory with the execution of its trust to the extent of building the railroad, for which the title to twenty miles of land along the line of the road, amounting to about seventy-six thousand acres of land, is made. Well, sir, the Committee on Public Lands, after mature consideration, came to the conclusion that it was entirely safe to trust one of the sovereign States with the execution of a trust where no larger tract of land than seventy-six thousand acres was involved; and they have, therefore, reported all these railroad bills with a provision precisely similar to that contained in this bill as originally reported to the House.

But, sir, if gentlemen will read the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, they will see that it is inconsistent with itself. The gentleman provides, in the first place, that no patent shall issue until the road shall be completed to a certain extent, and then he subsequently provides that the unsold lands shall revert to the Government. Why, there can be no unsold lands under these conditions. The Committee on Public Lands thought, in view of the fact that while strong, powerful companies would be able to build the first twenty miles of road without the assistance of any grant of land to aid them, weak companies, in sparsely populated sections of country, would find a provision that no lands should be granted until a certain portion of the road had been completed, a serious obstacle to the progress of their work; it would be making a discrimination in favor of the strong companies in the densely populated States, and against the weak companies in sparsely populated States to make such a provision, and therefore they reported the provision in this bill by which, before a company shall have completed the first twenty miles of its road, some part of the revenue from the sale of the lands along the line of the road, for the first twenty miles, may be realized. They thought that it would be safe to leave in the hands of the State or Territory, as a trustee, the execution of the trust of applying the proceeds of the sales of such lands to the construction of the first twenty miles of the road. After the road shall have been constructed thus far, the lands shall be given for another twenty miles, and so on. Not to have made such a provision, I repeat, would be to discriminate in favor of the strong against the weak companies.

Mr. ORR. If the gentleman from Ohio thinks the last paragraph of my amendment inconsistent with the former paragraph, I have no objection to its being stricken out.

Mr. DISNEY. It is most clearly inconsistent.

Mr. ORR. I will then withdraw the last provision in the amendment.

The amendment, as modified, was then reported by the Clerk.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The amendment does not need any modification. They ought to complete the road in ten years.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to offer an amendment, by way of perfecting the substitute of the gentleman from South Carolina. I move to add thereto the following:

And until patents shall be issued therefor the title to the said lands shall not vest in said Territory; no patent shall issue for any part of said lands until said Territory shall, in due form, assent to the provisions of this act, and shall agree to fulfill the same.

I do not perceive, sir, that the substitute of the gentleman from South Carolina contains that provision, and I think it is important. It was a portion of the provision as included in the amendment suggested yesterday by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CURTIS], and I believe it is important that it should be retained. I am in favor of the substitute of the gentleman from South Carolina, as far as it goes. I believe that it is necessary—necessary for the protection of Minnesota, as well as of the General Government. I believe that the bill, as it originally stood, would at once vest the title to all the land in the Territory of Minnesota, and there would be danger that it might be lost or squandered. I believe that this limitation can work no sort of danger or inconvenience to the Territory, or to the company that may be employed to construct this railroad. I believe further, that if we are to secure any portion of the advantages held out by the bill, we must also adopt the amendment I have suggested.

One section of the bill provides for the transportation of the troops and property of the United States Government; it declares also that the railroad shall be a public highway. But what security have we that it shall be so? None at all. The moment Minnesota becomes one of the States of the Union we shall certainly have no control over her highways or her corporations, and there is no security whatever which will compel or obligate, in any form whatever, that Territory, or any incorporation in that Territory, to perform any of the conditions which may seem to have been implied in the bill as originally proposed. Now I desire that we shall keep the promise to the hope as well as to the ear. If we mean fairly and honestly that the Territory, or the incorporation that may be established in the Territory, shall perform these conditions, let us see that they do. If they are willing to be bound by such conditions they cannot object to such a provision. I only propose to provide that the patents shall be issued where there is an affirmative acceptance by the Territory of this bill and the conditions in it. With this amendment I shall be ready to vote for the bill, for I can bring myself more readily and easily to support this measure, than many of the same kind.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Maine that his amendment is provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. WASHBURN. It did not seem so to me.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Government holds the land until the road is built twenty miles. When twenty miles of the road is completed then a patent issues, and the company is entitled to the land granted for the twenty miles. When they go on and build the next twenty miles of the road then they get the land granted for that distance; and so on until the entire road is constructed. Now, what is there to which the Legislature of Minnesota is to accede? Has not the Government the patent until the road is completed? The object at which the gentleman aims, it strikes me, is already attained.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let me ask the gentleman what provision there is in the bill binding the Territory, or the corporation to be chartered by the Territory, to carry the troops and property of the Government without charge?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The grant does that. When the Territory accepts the grant she does it with all the conditions annexed, and if she is prudent when she lets the road out to be constructed by a corporation she annexes the conditions with it. The State of Illinois did so when she passed her road over to a company. I presume the Legislature of Minnesota will do the same. Now we are not to suppose that that Territory will turn around and repudiate the conditions upon which she receives this grant of the public land. I have a better opinion of her than that.

Mr. DISNEY. Let me ask the gentleman one question. The gentleman from Illinois is contending, with great propriety and force, that the States or Territories should be trusted as the trustees to see that the various franchises of privileges and conditions set forth in the act are secured to the Government, and yet, from his remarks heretofore, he is not willing to trust the Territory with the seventy-six thousand acres of land provided for in the bill.

Mr. BISSELL. Of what value, I should like to know, would the land be, lying along that twenty miles of the line of road, unless the road were built? They might take the land, if you please, and not build the road; but what would they profit by it? They could not sell it in thirty years for $1 25 per acre. And it is not until the road is constructed that the land is of one cent's worth to those to whom it is granted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I do not perceive but that the substitute of the gentleman from South Carolina sufficiently secures the Government, so far as the title to the land is concerned; but what I desire is, and it is what I have not perceived to be sufficiently and clearly stated in his substitute, that the Territory shall be held to the performance of the condition to transport the troops of the Government. I have stated that to the gentleman from Illinois once before. I will now say to him, that if he is disposed that the Territory shall be held—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am willing to yield that gentlemen may propound questions, but not for a speech.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The amendment I have submitted can do no harm, at any event.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from New York proposed an amendment, making every provision that was deemed sufficient on the subject.

In reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY], I have to say, that because I declare the State shall not be trusted thus and so I do not mean she shall not be trusted for anything. I am not willing to trust her for everything. I am willing to trust her for something, small it is true.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Further debate and amendment is not in order at this time.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move to insert in the first part of the amendment the words "through the lands hereby granted," so that it will read, "through the lands hereby granted to said Territory shall be disposed of," &c.

Mr. ORR. If the gentleman desires, I accept his amendment as a modification of mine.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask that the amendment be reported.

Mr. ORR. Upon looking closely at the modification suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, I do not think that it ought to be made. It should be retained in the bill, that if the road is not constructed within ten years the land shall revert to the Government; and it is therefore necessary in that point of view.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman wishes to retain the amendment as originally introduced, excepting the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EDGERTON.]

The question being on the substitute of Mr. ORR, as modified, for the fourth section of the bill, it was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

The fifth section of the bill was read.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend that section by adding at the end of it the following proviso:

Provided, also, That before title to the land mentioned in the first section of this act shall vest in the said Territory, the Legislative Council of said Territory shall provide by law for submitting the acceptance or non-acceptance of the said grant of land to the people of the said Territory by a vote, to be taken at the usual places of holding elections in said Territory, and at such time as may be provided by law; and that if a majority of the qualified electors of the said Territory shall vote in favor of such acceptance, then the said land shall vest in said Territory; otherwise said grant shall be null and void.

Mr. WADE. I desire to state here, but under the five minutes' rule have not time to say, all that ought to be said in relation to this and the numerous other like bills which it is evident are to be brought forward for the action of the House. In my judgment they are wrong in principle, and cannot but prove injurious to the very interests they are ostensibly designed to subserve. It is claimed that the interests of the West are involved in the passage of these railroad bills. It would be morally impossible for me to do any act adverse to the interests of the West. All my interests and sympathies are with and for the West; and nothing in which western interests are involved, when justice is not violated, can meet my opposition.

Now, I do not believe that the passage of these bills promote western interests. They constitute monopolies of the most odious character. Who here can tell the House under what charters these roads will be constructed? And I appeal to the Democracy to give us light on this subject before we add to these monopolies the most extensive and odious land monopoly ever attempted to be imposed on the country. I do not know the number of these roads in charge of the different committees of this House, but it will not be extravagant to call them legion. The road in question calls for seven hundred and sixty-eight thousand acres—enough to furnish homesteads for four thousand eight hundred heads of families, and it withdraws from sale an equal quantity reserved to the Government at double the minimum price, thus excluding from this portion of the Territory nine thousand six hundred families. This effect, in case the homestead bill should pass the Senate, as it has passed the House, will do greater injury to the Territory than this railroad would do good, passing, as it is said to do, through an unsettled part of the country.

Now, sir, I believe this is altogether running before we are called. It is said here that before the stock of these roads becomes of any value the land must be settled. Why not wait, then, before building this road until the country is so far settled as to render the stock valuable? Why reverse the entire order of the settlement of the western country, and make railroads in advance of that settlement? Why not rather wait, and let things take their natural course, and let the people go in to these Territories and occupy the lands, and settle there, and so demonstrate the necessity—make it plain to the people of the country—that a railroad is needed, and thus invite capitalists in to construct a railroad?

By this bill the road need not be built under ten years; but the land is to be donated now. This is taking time by the forelock. Settling rapidly as the West now is, if the road passes through a district where a railroad is really needed, before the road need be made under this bill the country generally will have been already settled, and yet this land will belong to the Territory, or some corporation created by its authority. How, then, do we by this donation secure, make certain, any benefit to the West?

But it is said we must trust the territorial authorities to make the right use of this property. Why, then, not donate the land outright to the Territory, and give it a confidence coextensive with our generosity? Why confine this gift to this railroad, with its commencement, terminus, and general course, all absolutely defined? Could we not as well trust the Territory in these most important matters as in any other? I am strongly impressed, Mr. Chairman, with the belief that if our confidence in the Territory was as ample as this, and we should make this bill so utter our confidence, that there might not improbably be a forthwith stamped among the multitudinous lobby members who are so anxious for the passage of this bill.

No, sir, I am persuaded that there is "speculation in their eyes;" that this great anxiety for the people of the West is based upon mere private interests; that though we cannot see, yet we can most probably feel.

It is further said that the State of Illinois, which received so great a bounty from the Government, has derived the greatest benefit from that donation. It may be, sir; but I am skeptical as to the fact whether that great central railroad is a cause of the prosperity of that State. In my humble judgment that railroad itself, and the whole railroad system of the West, are rather the effect than the cause of the great prosperity of the West. Railroads cannot create; they can only develop. They do not go before, but only accompany prosperity.

But, sir, the great objection to this, and all the other railroads on which, I suppose, we shall be called upon to act, is, that we make them enormous land monopolies, which will be easier, we shall find, and so will the people, to create than to destroy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman from Ohio will look at his proposition for a moment, he will see in what contradictions it involves him; and it is this: that we ought to wait until the country is settled before we give the land; but when the country is settled, we shall have no land to give. That is all there is of it.

Mr. WADE. I would ask the gentleman whether he does not believe that the people of the Territory are better judges of the matter than we can be?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no doubt of it; not the least. If I had, I would not be pressing this bill.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if he has not made a mistake in the phraseology of his amendment? If he will look at his amendment, he will see that he has referred to only one branch of the Legislature, instead of saying the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. WADE. It may be so; but that can easily be corrected.

The question was then taken on the motion offered by Mr. WADE; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BRIDGES. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out all of the fifth section after the word "Department," in the third line, and insert as follows:

—free of any charge or expense whatsoever to the said Department, for a period of fifteen years from the time the said railroad shall be put in operation.

So that the section shall read:

"That the United States mail shall be transported over said railroad, under the direction of the Post Office Department, free of any charge or expense whatsoever to the said Department, for a period of fifteen years from the time the said railroad shall be put in operation."

Mr. BRIDGES. My object in offering the amendment is to change an important feature of this bill, if possible, from a donation of land to a bill of sale.

Mr. HENN. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if there is any donation in it? I desire him to point out the place in it where one acre of land is given.

Mr. BRIDGES. That was one object for which I rose. When I first took up this bill and read it, I was amused at the fascinating language used in the first two lines; and it struck me very forcibly, that whenever there is an attempt made to get property from the United States, the idea is held out that the Government is to be benefited by it in some way or other. This is for the purpose of fascinating, charming, and alluring members into the support of a measure, which they would not do, if it were not couched in language of that description. May I not call it a species of sympathy for the Government, or the desire to exercise a guardian care over it? Let me say to those who use such language for the purpose of operating upon this House, that it reminds me of the sympathy which vultures show to the lambs when devouring them—such sympathy as the crocodile exhibits when he mingles his tears with the blood of his expiring victim. Let me say to this committee, that the contingency upon which this bill hangs, and which its friends hang upon it, is too far distant in the future to demand any consideration at the hands of this committee. If the idea is held out that this road may be wanted for the purpose of transporting troops and munitions of war over it, such an event may not happen for a century to come.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to one fact, and that is this: That we come up from the bosom of the people here, and as their representatives, we are legislating in reference to their property, and not our own property. We are the agents of the people; and am I, as the agent of a small constituency, to give away the property of the people without an ample remuneration for it? The Constitution does not allow it. That portion of the Constitution under which this is asked, to wit: the third section of the fourth article, never intended that the property of the people should be given away without a valuable consideration. I have heard it said upon this floor that the word "dispose" may be variously construed. It never can be construed to mean as giving away the property of the people. The word "dispose" means to sell, and no other meaning can be given to it—certainly not according to the general acceptance of the term, and the definition of any lexicographer. I ask, then, why there should not be some remuneration made by this vast company that will be incorporated in consequence of making this grant? I call the attention of the committee to this scheme, which is only second in importance and magnitude to the great scheme of a certain gentleman who for years was boring members of Congress for the purpose of getting a grant of a strip of land sixty miles wide, to extend from Lake Michigan to the Pacific ocean.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OLDS. I dislike to oppose any amendment offered by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRIDGES]; but it appears to me that his amendment makes an invidious distinction against this railroad, that the postal arrangements of the country do not really demand. Sir, the committee originally reported precisely the same provision in this bill, in respect to carrying the mail, which is contained in all the other railroad bills. It is that Congress itself shall fix the price at which the mail shall be transported over the road; and it is precisely what you want in respect to the railroads of the country. Why do you want this railroad to carry the mail free of cost, when you have determined to pay the Central railroad in Illinois, and all the other roads to which you have made grants of land? Congress has the right, and that is what the wants of the country demand, to fix a uniform rate of compensation to be paid to the various railroad companies for the transportation of the mails.

Between this city and New York you are now paying $3 75 per mile per annum. That is wrong, and it demands a remedy at the hands of Congress. But because some of the railroads in the country have imposed upon the Post Office Department, by charging enormous prices for the transportation of the mail, is that any reason why we should go to this new Territory of Minnesota and demand that this railroad should carry your mails for nothing?

[A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary—the Speaker having temporarily resumed the chair for that purpose—informed the House that the Senate had passed—

House bill (No. 14) to amend an act entitled "An act to divide the State of Arkansas into two judicial districts," approved March, 1851; and House bill (No. 276) for the relief of William Mayo.

The former, with an amendment, in which he asked the concurrence of the House; and the latter without amendment.]

Mr. OLDS, continued. I was proceeding to say, that because a portion of the railroads in the country have charged the Post Office Department an enormous price for transporting the mail, is it just that in order to equalize the matter, and balance these impositions, you should go to this infant Territory and provide that its railroads shall carry the mail for nothing? Sir, I repeat that this section in this bill places in the hands of the Government just such a power as Congress ought to exercise over every railroad in the country: It is that Congress shall cause the railroads to carry the mail at such a rate of compensation as it may fix. I maintain that that is a wholesome provision, and it is all that is necessary. It will effectually prevent the exaction of extravagant rates of charges, and we certainly do not want these roads to do our work for nothing. There is no reason why the same provisions should not be applied to the grants for railroads in the States. I repeat, that it is a wholesome provision, and that I hope we shall not go to the infant Territory of Minnesota to make the first condition such as is now proposed.

The question was put; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GREY. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the fifth section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to offer an additional section to the bill.

Mr. GREY. I move the following, to come in at the end of the fifth section of the bill:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That there shall be, and is hereby, severally granted to each of the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Georgia, and Virginia, public lands, at the rate of one hundred and fifty thousand acres for each Senator and Representative to which said States are respectively entitled. And to each of the States of Ohio and Indiana all the public lands remaining unsold in said States respectively, not reserved for any public purpose. And a further grant, at the rate of fifty thousand acres for each Senator and Representative, is hereby made to each of the States of Ohio and Indiana respectively; said lands to be taken in the manner, and applied to the purposes hereinafter mentioned.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Public Lands shall issue to each of the States named in the preceding section land warrants to the amount, in all, to which each of the said States are respectively entitled under said section, (exclusive of the lands granted to Ohio and Indiana, within the limits of those States.) And the said States are severally authorized to sell said land warrants, and apply the proceeds thereof to aid in the construction of railroads. Said warrants shall be for not less than eighty or more than one hundred and sixty acres each; and the same shall be valid in the hands of the owners or holders thereof, and may be located upon any of the surveyed public lands which shall be at the time for sale, and subject to private entry. And the title to the land so located under said warrants, shall be perfected to the owner or holders thereof, in the same manner as under other land warrants issued by the United States; and the same fees to be paid therefor. Said land warrants to be properly printed and engraved, and signed by or under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Lands, and countersigned, as they are sold, by or under the direction of the Governors of each of said States respectively: Provided, That no State shall locate any of said land warrants in its own name, or for its own benefit. And no land warrants shall be located upon any lands to which there shall be a preemption right, or upon which there shall be an actual settlement and cultivation, except by the person holding such preemption right, or by such settler and cultivator. And not more than one half of any section of land shall be located under said land warrants.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the remaining half sections, or parts of sections of land remaining, upon which said land warrants shall have, in part, been located, are hereby reserved to the United States, and shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of the public lands when sold. Nor shall the remaining parts of said sections become subject to private entry until the same have been first offered at public sale at the increased price.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the United States mail, and the troops and property of the United States, shall be at all times transported on all railroads, made either wholly or in part from the proceeds of the lands granted by this act, under the direction of the proper Departments, free of charge, or for such compensation only as Congress may by law determine. And until so fixed by law, for such compensation as the Postmaster General shall direct.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. I submit the question of order, that that amendment is not germane to the bill, and is, therefore, out of order. This is a bill for the construction of a railroad in Minnesota, and the amendment proposes to distribute the lands among the States for purposes of internal improvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair adheres to a decision made on a previous occasion, during the consideration of this bill, and rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. GREY. Do I understand the Chairman to rule my amendment out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does so.

Mr. GREY. Well, I ask the Chair, for the sake of obtaining information—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. Does the gentleman take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. GREY. I wish first to ask a question of the Chair: Is not the original bill, to which this is offered as an amendment, a bill proposing to grant lands to a Territory, and to a portion of the States, for railroad purposes?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; it makes no grant to any State.

Mr. GREY. Well, to a Territory?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate of this kind, by way of interrogatory, is not in order. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. GREY. Yes, sir; I appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided that the amendment, submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky, is not in order, because it is not germane to the bill, and because it is in violation of the order of the House, directing the kind of business which the committee shall consider on this day. From that decision the gentleman from Kentucky appeals, and the question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. GREY. Have I a right to say anything?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; debate is not in order.

Mr. DEAN. I desire to know whether the provisions of the amendment apply to lands in the Territories only?

The CHAIRMAN. No; to lands generally.

Mr. KERR. I call for tellers on the appeal.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLINGMAN and RICHARDSON were appointed.

The question was taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained; the tellers having reported—ayes 88, noes 37.

Mr. GREY. I move the following as an additional section to the bill:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of Kentucky, thirteen hundred thousand acres of the public lands, for the purpose of aiding in constructing a railroad from Cincinnati by Louisville and along the most advantageous and practicable route to some point on the Mississippi river in said State. And fourteen hundred thousand acres for the purpose of aiding in constructing a railroad from Hopkinsville by Danville, &c., to the mouth of the Big Sandy river, with a branch from some point on said road east of Bowling Green to or near Cumberland Gap, to be located by the Legislature of said State. And five hundred thousand acres for the purpose of aiding in constructing a railroad from Henderson toward Nashville, Tennessee, and for the purpose of aiding in constructing that part of the Chicago, Cairo and Mobile road, crossing the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, from the mouth of the Ohio to the Mississippi State line, an equal number of acres per mile, as was granted to aid in constructing those portions of said road from Chicago through the State of Illinois, to Cairo, and from the south boundary of the State of Tennessee through the States of Mississippi and Alabama to Mobile.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the State of Kentucky shall apply the proceeds of said lands hereby granted exclusively to aid in the construction of said railroads specified in the foregoing section, and for no other purposes. And the Commissioner of Public Lands, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall issue to the State of Kentucky land warrants to the amount of said three millions seven hundred thousand acres of public lands. And said State is authorized to sell and dispose of said land warrants, and the same are to be valid and effectual in the hands of any owner or holder thereof, and may be located by such owner or holder upon any public lands subject to private entry in the same manner as land warrants for military services are authorized by law to be located. And the title of the land so located by any owner or holder of said land warrants shall be secured and perfected to such owner or holder in the same manner as other land warrants issued by the United States. Said land warrants shall be so engraved and printed as to prevent deception and counterfeiting; shall be signed by the Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of the Public Lands, or for them by such other person or persons as the Secretary may direct, and countersigned by the Governor of the State of Kentucky, or by such other officer as the Legislature of said State may designate for that purpose, and said land warrants shall not be for less than eighty nor over one hundred and sixty acres each: Provided, That said State shall not be authorized to locate any warrants in its own name or for its own benefit; and that no warrant issued under the provisions of this act shall be located upon any lands which have been specially reserved to the United States or to which there shall be a preemption right, or on which there shall be an actual settlement and cultivation, except by the person holding such preemption right, or by such settler and cultivator.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That each and all of the roads mentioned in the first section, if made either wholly or in part from the proceeds of the public lands granted by this act, are hereby made and declared post-roads and shall at all times transport the mails, military stores, troops, and property of the United States, under the direction of the proper officers thereof, at such compensation as Congress may by law direct.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already made the decision as to the question of order.

Mr. GREY. May I refer the Chair to a decision on this precise bill, made at the last session, where this same question was made and decided in an opposite way?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recollects the decision, but he does not believe that the House correctly decided then.

Mr. GREY. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question is: "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Committee?"

The question was taken; and the decision was affirmed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the committee do now rise, and report the bill to the House.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee (Mr. PHELPS) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly Senate bill (No. 38) "To aid the Territory of Minnesota in constructing a railroad for military, postal, and other purpose," and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move to lay the bill and amendments upon the table.

Mr. DENT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion. I want to go back into committee in order to pass two or three bills. This is the last of the days set aside for the consideration of local territorial business, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion.

Mr. DENT. I withdraw it.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I renew it.

The question was put, and decided in the negative.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurring upon the motion to lay the bill upon the table,

Mr. HAMILTON called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I rise to a point of order. Is it in order, after having just voted upon a motion to adjourn, to make that motion again?

The SPEAKER. It is in order, as there has been action since the motion to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was then taken upon the motion to adjourn, and decided in the negative.

The question was then put upon the motion to lay the bill upon the table, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 68, nays 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bennett, Bocoek, Boyce, Bridges, Carpenter, Chaistain, Chrisman, Craig, Thomas Davis, Dean, Dent, Drum, Edmundson, Elliott, Everhart, Ewing, Faulkner, Fuller, Gamble, Giddings, Goode, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Hiester, Hill, Houston, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Keitt, Kidwell, Kittredge, Krutz, Lane, Letcher, McCulloch, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Maurice, May, Middlesworth, Millson, Morrison, Murray, Nichols, Peckham, Preston, Puryear, Seward, Seymour, Shaw, Shower, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Snodgrass, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, Trout, Uly, Vansant, and Wade—68.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Ball, Banks, Barksdale, Benson, Bissell, Breckinridge, Brooks, Euge, Campbell, Caruthers, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Cullom, John G. Davis, DeWitt, Dick, Dickinson, Disney, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Edmunds, English, Farley, Florence, Franklin, Goodrich, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Harrison, Henn, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Rowland Jones, Kerr, Knox, Lindsay, McDougall, Macy, Matteson, Mayall, Meacham, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morgan, Noble, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Pratt, Pringle, Ready, Reese, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Sapp, Shannon, Simmons, Singleton, George W. Smyth, Hester L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Upham, Wabridge, Walley, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler,

Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, Yates, and Zollicoffer—101.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SAGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GREY. I desire to ask the Chair a question before we vote upon this subject. I ask for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will propound his question.

Mr. GREY. My question is this: As the Committee on Public Lands will not report any bill giving to the old States any share of the public lands, I desire to know if there is any way by which a bill of that kind can be brought before the House?

The SPEAKER. That is a question which the Chair cannot decide now, at any rate.

The previous question then received a second.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were, on a division, ayes 74, noes 83.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurring on seconding the main question—

Mr. SAGE demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and PHELPS were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 81.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. ORR. There are several amendments to the bill; and it being desirable that some other territorial bills should be disposed of in Committee of the Whole, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of disposing of them.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent, as the House has ordered the main question to be put, and it must now be put.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to know if the amendments cannot be acted on en masse?

The SPEAKER. That course will be taken, unless objection be made.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose no one will desire a separate vote upon any except the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. KERR.]

The SPEAKER. The usual course will be taken. The amendments will be read by the Clerk in their order; and any gentleman wishing a separate vote upon one will indicate it.

The Clerk then read the amendments.

Mr. DEAN demanded a separate vote upon the fourth amendment, and demanded the yeas and nays upon its adoption.

Mr. LETCHER demanded a separate vote upon the sixth amendment.

Mr. KERR. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and decided in the negative.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The amendments upon which a separate vote had not been asked were then agreed to without division.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the adoption of the fourth amendment, upon which the gentleman from New York demanded a separate vote.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

Insert at the end of the third section, the following: Provided, however, That the money arising from the sales of the reserved sections, shall be paid over to those States which have received no grant of the public lands for internal improvements, according to their representation in Congress.

Mr. DEAN. I demand the yeas and nays upon its adoption.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the amendment, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 85, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Appleton, Ball, Bennett, Benson, Boyce, Bridges, Brooks, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskey, Chandler, Chase, Chastain, Chrisman, Clingman, Cox, Crocker, Culloin, Thomas Davis, Dent, Dick, Dickinson, Edmunds, Edmundson, Everhart, Ewing, Farley, Faulkner, Franklin, Goode, Goodrich, Grey, Haven, Hiestler, Hill, Howe, Daniel T. Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kittredge, Kurtz, Letcher, McCulloch, McMullin, McQueen, Matteson, Maurice, Meacham, Middlesworth, Millson, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Bishop Perkins, Pratt, Pringle, Puryear, Reese, David Ritchie, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Seward, Shaw, Simmons, William Smith, Snodgrass, Stratton, Thurston, Tracy, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walbridge, Walley, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, and Zollicoffer—85.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Banks, Barksdale, Bissell, Breckinridge, Campbell, Caruthers, Clark, Cobb, Cook, Craige, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Drum, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Ellison, English, Gamble, Greenwood, Grow, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Knox, Lane, Lindsley, Macdonald, McDougall, McNair, Macy, Maxwell, May, Mayall, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, John Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Sapp, Seymour, Shannon, Shower, Singleton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Hestor L. Stevens, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Trout, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Wells, John Wentworth, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Yates—84.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERR. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 69, noes 100.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion.

Mr. HENN. I demand tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Upon seconding the demand for tellers, 24 gentlemen voted in the affirmative; and the Speaker decided that tellers were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit that 24 is not a sufficient number to order tellers.

The SPEAKER. The usual practice of the House has been to consider 24 a sufficient number.

Mr. JONES. The rules of the House require one fifth of a quorum to order tellers. Twenty-four is a fifth of a quorum, but there may be more than a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that tellers are ordered, and appoints Messrs. VAIL and FAULKNER as such.

The House was divided, and the tellers reported 36 in the affirmative—a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 64, nays 104; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Banks, Bissell, Breckinridge, Campbell, Caruthers, Clark, Cobb, Cook, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Ellison, English, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hendricks, Henn, Johnson, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kerr, Knox, Lindsley, McDougall, Macy, Matteson, Maxwell, John G. Miller, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, John Perkins, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Sapp, Seymour, Shannon, Shaw, Singleton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Hestor L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Walbridge, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Wells, John Wentworth, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Yates—64.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Appleton, Ball, Barksdale, Bennett, Benson, Boyce, Bridges, Brooks, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskey, Chandler, Chase, Chastain, Chrisman, Clingman, Cox, Craige, Crocker, Culloin, Dent, Dick, Dickinson, Drum, Edmunds, Elliott, Everhart, Ewing, Farley, Faulkner, Franklin, Fuller, Gamble, Goode, Goodrich, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hiestler, Hill, Houston, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Daniel T. Jones, Keitt, Kidwell, Kittredge, Kurtz, Lane, Letcher, McCulloch, Macdonald, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Maurice, May, Meacham, Middlesworth, Millson, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Pratt, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, Reese, David Ritchie, Robbins, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Seward, Shower, Simmons, William Smith, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walley, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, and Zollicoffer—104.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on Mr. KERR's motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

Mr. PHILLIPS. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the bill and all the amendments on the table.

Mr. HENN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put, and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.

Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw my motion until the question has been taken on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

[Loud cries of "No, no!" "Hold on!" and great confusion.]

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DEAN. I move to lay the bill upon the table, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. OLDS. I move that the House do now adjourn, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 69, nays 98; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Banks, Barksdale, Bissell, Breckinridge, Campbell, Caruthers, Clark, Cobb, Cook, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Drum, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Ellison, English, Gamble, Greenwood, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hendricks, Henn, Hunt, Johnson, Geo. W. Jones, Roland Jones, Knox, Lindsley, McDougall, Macy, Matteson, Maxwell, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, John Perkins, Phelps, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Sapp, Shannon, Singleton, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Hestor L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Walbridge, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Wells, John Wentworth, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Yates—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Appleton, Ball, Bennett, Benson, Boyce, Bridges, Brooks, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskey, Chandler, Chase, Chastain, Chrisman, Clingman, Cox, Craige, Crocker, Culloin, Dent, Dick, Dickinson, Edmunds, Edmundson, Elliott, Everhart, Ewing, Farley, Faulkner, Franklin, Fuller, Goode, Goodrich, Grey, Grow, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hiestler, Hill, Houston, Howe, Hughes, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kittredge, Kurtz, Lane, Letcher, McCulloch, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Maurice, May, Meacham, Middlesworth, Millson, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Bishop Perkins, Pratt, Pringle, Puryear, Reese, David Ritchie, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Seward, Shaw, Shower, Simmons, William Smith, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, Tracy, Trout, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walley, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, and Zollicoffer—98.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEAN] to lay the bill upon the table, and on that motion the yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. HENN. I rise to what I suppose to be a privileged question. I move that when this House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next; and on that motion I now demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That motion is not privileged in its character. I would inquire of the Chair whether it is in order? There is already a motion pending upon which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia that it would have been in order for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENN] to have submitted his motion even after the yeas and nays had been ordered on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN.]

Mr. HENN. The motion to adjourn over, though not a privileged one, is always in order.

Mr. SMITH. If the Chair will allow me: the gentleman from Iowa got the floor by rising to a privileged question.

Mr. HENN. I will make an explanation to the gentleman from Virginia. I rose to what I supposed to be a privileged question. I got the floor—that was enough—and made the motion.

Mr. SMITH. I hold that the gentleman from Iowa has no right, under such an allegation as that, to make his motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the motion of the gentleman from Iowa. He could have made it, as I have said, even though the yeas and nays had been ordered on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SMITH. A motion to adjourn could be made then; but I suppose a motion to adjourn for a specified time would not take precedence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that it would.

Mr. LETCHER. Are there not more than three days between this and Monday?

Mr. HENN. Sunday is no day.

Mr. LETCHER. Does not the gentleman draw his pay for Sunday? If he does not, then Sunday is no day.

[Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. KERR. I move to lay the motion to adjourn over until Monday on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on the motion to adjourn. The question was then put, and decided in the negative—yeas 3, nays 130.

So the motion to adjourn till Monday was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ORR.) The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from New York to lay on the table.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, it is now five o'clock, and I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

The question on the motion to adjourn was then put; and 62 voted in the affirmative.

Mr. CHRISMAN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; only 23 members voting for them.

Mr. OLDS. Count the other side.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to count the other side, for twenty-three is not one fifth of a quorum.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for tellers upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a question of order. I called for a count of the other side on the demand for the yeas and nays. The Chair decided that one fifth of a quorum had not voted. My point of order is, that it is not necessary to have a quorum to adjourn. That is one of the things which, under the Constitution, you can do without a quorum; and that being so, one fifth of those present can demand the yeas and nays, though there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ground upon which the Chair placed his decision was that the demand of the gentleman was not made in time. The Chair stated that only twenty-three voted in the affirmative, and that he did not think that was a sufficient number, and then announced that the yeas and nays were not ordered. Then the gentleman from Ohio demanded to have the other side counted.

Mr. OLDS. But the reason which the Chair gave was, that one-fifth of a quorum had not voted.

Tellers were then ordered on the motion to adjourn; and Messrs. VAIL and PHILLIPS were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 78.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move that when this House adjourn it adjourn to meet on Monday next, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 8, nays 103.

No quorum voting.

Mr. OLDS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move a call of the House.

Mr. OLDS. The previous question has been seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and a call of the House is therefore not now in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot entertain a motion for a call of the House. The last paragraph of the 50th rule reads as follows:

"On a motion for the previous question, and prior to the seconding of the same, a call of the House shall be in order; but after a majority shall have seconded such motion, no call shall be in order prior to a decision of the main question."

Mr. CRAIGE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DEAN. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CRAIGE] to withdraw his appeal. Certainly, no gentleman who has listened to the reading of the rule will vote to overrule the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WHEELER. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I withdraw my motion for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS,] that the House adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, twenty-one gentlemen only rising.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It does not require one fifth of a quorum to order the yeas and nays upon a motion to adjourn; but one fifth of those present can order them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was not one fifth of those present who desired the yeas and nays.

The question was then taken; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 50, noes 70.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CRAIGE. I understand the question now to be upon the motion of my colleague, [Mr. KERR,] to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which his amendment was adopted; and I ask that the Chair put the question upon that motion before entertaining any other.

The SPEAKER. There are other questions pending which must first be taken. The question now is upon the motion that the bill and amendments be laid upon the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is stating a question of order. The question first in order is upon the motion to lay on the table; which motion the Chair will put to the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is to that point I rise. A motion was before the House to adjourn over until Saturday. Upon that motion, the yeas and nays having been taken, there appeared no quorum voting. The motion was not, therefore, disposed of, and I submit that nothing else is in order until it has been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. A majority of the members voting upon the motion to which the gentleman from Illinois alludes were in the negative. The subsequent action of the House shows that a quorum is present, and the motion is therefore lost.

Mr. OLDS. No quorum voted upon the motion to adjourn over, and the question, therefore, certainly could not have been decided. I submit that a quorum having appeared, the question must first be taken upon that motion again.

Mr. GREY. I rise to a question of order. My question of order is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] had no right to address the Chair when he was dividing the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky. The gentleman from Illinois had the right to raise his question of order.

Mr. BISSELL. I wish to say that the House has no information, officially, that a quorum is present. That fact has not been officially announced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides, that there is a quorum present, as indicated by a count of the House upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I only want to state my question of order so as to have it understood by the Chair, and have it decided. I submit that the proposition upon which the yeas and nays showed that there was no quorum voting has not yet been disposed of. That is now before the House, and is the question pending.

Mr. CRAIGE. I call the gentleman from Illinois to order. The Chair has decided that a quorum is here, and therefore the gentleman is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois rose to a question of order, as he had the right to do, and is now stating it. The Chair decides that a quorum is present, and if that is the gentleman's point he overrules it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let me ask the Chair upon what question it appeared that no quorum voted?

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is upon the floor, stating a question of order, which must first be disposed of.

Mr. LETCHER. But my question of order has reference to the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair has already decided the question raised by him, and if he is not satisfied with the decision let him take an appeal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has not been allowed to go on long enough yet to state what his question is. That is what the Chair is trying to understand.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The point I make is this: A motion was made that when this House adjourn it adjourn to meet on Saturday next. The question was taken upon that proposition, and no quorum voted. Less than a quorum cannot adjourn over. That proposition, therefore, has not been decided by the House; it is the question now before the House, and must be taken by yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion, that inasmuch as the motion to adjourn over until Saturday has not been decided by a majority of the House, it is still pending, and must first be taken. Upon which question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CRAIGE. I rise to a question of order. That question has once been taken by yeas and nays, and cannot again be taken in that manner, unless the yeas and nays are again ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was under a misapprehension. The yeas and nays had not been ordered. They were ordered on a previous vote, but that order had been exhausted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the Speaker hear me? The question upon the motion to adjourn over until Saturday was taken by yeas and nays, and on that vote there were—yeas 6, nays 103. It requires 118 to make a quorum. There was no quorum voting, and that is the question now before the House.

The SPEAKER. No vote upon it having been taken, the Chair was right in the first instance, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. SAGE. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Claims [Mr. EDGERTON] if he really desires the House to adjourn over till Saturday? Because, if so, I hope the House will gratify him by agreeing to the motion.

Mr. MEACHAM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order until the pending question is disposed of as it has priority of a motion to adjourn.

The Clerk then commenced the call of the roll, and proceeded as far as the name of JAMES C. ALLEN, without any response being made.

Mr. HENN. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The call of the roll has commenced; but as no member has answered to his name, the gentleman from Iowa can state his point of order.

Mr. HENN. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the roll has not already been once called under this order of the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. Yes; it has.

Mr. HENN. Can it be called immediately after that, no business having intervened?

The SPEAKER. The former vote was inoperative, from the fact that there was not a majority of the House voting.

Mr. HENN. Then is any motion in order but a motion to adjourn, or any business in order but to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the Chair state what that question of order is?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa makes this question: That the yeas and nays were ordered upon the previous vote, and the House proceeded to take that vote. He insists now that the yeas and nays must be ordered again before the Clerk can proceed to call the roll. The Chair decides that the former vote was inoperative. Inasmuch as no quorum voted, of course that vote could be of no effect.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw that point; there is another which I desire to submit.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. HENN. I cannot withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WASHBURN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair upon the ground that inasmuch as there was not a quorum voting on the last question, no other motion can be entertained but a motion to adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is true. No other motion can be entertained.

The SPEAKER. The question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. McMULLIN. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. HENN. I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a question of order, and it is this: that business having intervened between the last motion to adjourn and the motion now made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MEACHAM,] his motion is in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules that question of order, upon the ground that a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn takes precedence of a motion to adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask the Chair—

[Loud cries of "Order!" and "Question!"]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the Speaker hear me for a moment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to understand if an appeal is taken from his decision?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire only to ask a question.

Mr. DEAN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask the Chair a question. If I understand the decision of the Chair, it is, that after it is ascertained that there is no quorum present, no motion can be entertained but the motion which preceded. Is that the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, I will try and make the Chair understand me. I understand the Chair to decide that a motion to adjourn cannot be made.

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair decides no such thing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Chair decides that a motion to adjourn till Saturday takes precedence of a motion to adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. Yes; that is right.

The SPEAKER. That is the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Suppose the House is again found without a quorum; can you ever get a vote to adjourn? You cannot have a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That question will be determined when it arises.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It seems to me that the gentleman from Illinois does not recollect the last vote. The House was voting by yeas and nays on the question to adjourn over until Saturday next. When the call was through, there was no quorum. Then the Chair entertained a motion to adjourn; and, on a division of the House, there were yeas 50, noes 70, which made a quorum. The Chair then decided, and I think correctly, that a quorum being present, the question recurred on the motion to adjourn over until Saturday. I think that is the way the question stands before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DEAN. I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. MIDDLESWORTH. I hope the Chair will read the rule to the gentleman over the way. [Great laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is a good reader, and I trust that he will read the rule. [Renewed laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn shall always be in order. It has been decided and acted on under the rule that a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn shall take precedence of a motion to adjourn.

[Cries of "Question."] The question was then put on the motion to adjourn over until Saturday next; and the roll being called, there were—yeas 2, nays 92—no quorum—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ball and Haven—2.

NAVS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, Appleton, Banks, Barksdale, Bennett, Benson, Bockock, Boyce, Bridges, Brooks, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskie, Chase, Chastian, Chrisman, Cobb, Cox, Craige, Cullom, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dickinson, Drum, Edmonds, Edmundson, Everhart, Ewing, Farley, Faulkner, Franklin, Fuller, Grey, Grow, Harrison, Hendricks, Hibbard, Hiestter, Hill, Houston, Hughes, Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kittredge, Lane, Letcher, McCulloch, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Maurice, May, Middleswarth, Smith Miller, Millson, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Nichols, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Bishop Perkins, Phillips, Pratt, Puryear, Ready, Rogers, Russell, Sage, Sapp, Seward, Seymour, Shaw, Shower, Simmons, Skelton, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, and Hendrick B. Wright—92.

At the conclusion of the call of the roll, and previous to the announcement of the result by the Speaker,

Mr. CAMPBELL said: Mr. Speaker, I ask to be excused from voting on the proposition to adjourn until Saturday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the gentleman ought to have asked to be excused from voting before the roll-call. He cannot ask to be excused now.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio rises in his place and asks to be excused from voting, the roll-call having been completed. The Chair declines to direct the Clerk to call his name, on the ground that he should have made his application before the call of the roll commenced. The gentleman appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

The question was taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. CRAIGE. I desire to know of the Chair whether there is no mode of compelling members to vote when they are present?

The SPEAKER. In reply to the gentleman, the Chair will read the following rule:

"42. Every member who shall be in the House when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the House, for special reason, shall excuse him. All motions to excuse a member from voting shall be made before the House divides, or before the call of the yeas and nays is commenced; and the question shall then be taken without further debate."

The Chair sees no other power, unless the House deems it fit to exercise that power to compel members to vote. He has never yet seen a member compelled to vote, though he presumes the House has authority to compel members to vote.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. The House can commit members for contempt.

Mr. CRAIGE. The minority ought not to have the right to defeat the law of the majority.

[Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER here announced that there was no quorum voting on the motion to adjourn until Saturday next.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STUART, of Ohio. I demand the yeas and nays on the proposition.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only fifteen voting in the affirmative.

Mr. KURTZ. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Is it in order to move that there be a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, asked a question which was utterly inaudible to the reporter.

[Cries of "Order!" "Question!"]

Mr. SEWARD. I move, Mr. Speaker, to reconsider the vote by which the last question was adopted.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; which was carried.

Thereupon the House, at six o'clock, p. m., adjourned till to-morrow at twelve, m.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 10, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOUCEY. I wish to present a petition.

The PRESIDENT. That cannot be done unless by unanimous consent. This is private bill day, and it requires unanimous consent to proceed with any other business.

Mr. PETTIT and others objected.

The PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the Senate must proceed to the consideration of private bills.

Mr. SHIELDS. I rise to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow the vote to be taken upon the passage of the bill to promote the efficiency of the Army by retiring disabled officers. It was read a third time yesterday, but its passage was arrested for want of a quorum. I presume no honorable Senator will object to it, when he knows that there is a great necessity for its passage at as early a period as possible. It is a bill which has been introduced session after session for a great many years, but has fallen between the two Houses, in consequence of passing one House at too late a period to be acted upon in the other. I hope, therefore, that my friend from Indiana will not insist on our enforcing the rule to-day. I acknowledge that he has a right to insist, and it is proper that we should proceed with private bills.

But at the same time I can state to him that there is a necessity—a present, urgent necessity for the passage of this bill. I have been urged by the Department to appeal to the Senate to take it up and pass it as promptly as possible; and that is the reason why I ask the Senate now to proceed to its consideration. I consented that it should not be pressed during the pendency of the Nebraska bill, because that was pressing upon us urgently; but I hope the Senate will permit the bill to pass now.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President, so far from my believing that there is a present necessity for passing this bill, I do not believe there is, or will be a necessity for passing it at all. I believe it to be all wrong from beginning to end, and I will always vote against it, and to-day I object to taking it up.

HODGES AND LANSDALE, AND JOHNSON.

The PRESIDENT. Then the Senate must proceed to the consideration of the private bills upon the Calendar. The first is a bill for the relief of Hodges & Lansdale, and the legal representatives of Rinaldo Johnson and Ann E. Johnson, deceased.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, that bill and the two succeeding bills on the Calendar belong to a class of cases which I feel it my duty to oppose. I do not think them sustainable under the laws of the United States, or on any principles connected with former laws. The honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT,] who is not now present, entertains a contrary opinion. I told him, when he mentioned to me, some few days ago, that he would not be present to-day, that I would move the postponement of the bills, in order that he might be fairly and fully heard before the Senate whenever the question to be discussed should arise. I therefore move that this bill and the two succeeding bills, one for the relief of the legal representatives of John G. Mackall, deceased, and the other for the relief of William G. Ridgely, be postponed until Friday next.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, they will be postponed.

There was no objection.

BISHOP AND ARNOLD'S PATENT.

The bill for the relief of George G. Bishop and the legal representatives of John Arnold, deceased, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to enact that the letters patent granted to John Arnold, (a citizen of the United States,) dated the 15th of July, 1829, and the letters patent granted to him, and to George G. Bishop, (also a citizen of the United States,) dated the 20th of October, 1836, for a new and useful improvement in the machine for forming a web of cloth of wool, hair, or other suitable substance, without spinning or weaving, be renewed, revived, and extended for the term of fourteen years.

The application is for the extension of two patents, having for their object the manufacture of cloths from wool, hair, and similar materials, without spinning or weaving. Specimens of the fabrics thus made show the rapid improvements which have been made, and which render it highly probable that, in the course of time, cloth may in this way be made of equal durability and texture, and at a cheaper cost of production; but the invention is new, and requires time and numerous experiments to develop it perfectly. The first patent was granted to John Arnold, of Norwalk, in the State of Connecticut, on the 15th of July, 1829. But the machine did not prove successful, until certain improvements or additions were made, for which a new patent was taken out on the 20th of October, 1836, in the name of Arnold and John G. Bishop. This patent was renewed by the Commissioner of Patents in 1850 for the term of seven years; but the original patent of 1829 was never renewed, except so far as its principles were involved in the subsequent one of 1836.

It appears that, in the first attempt to apply the principles of these patents to practicable purposes, heavy losses were incurred; and that the additional patent of 1836 could not be employed in the production of any merchantable commodity, until after many experiments and an outlay of large sums of money, for which the inventors allege they have never been fully remunerated. In consequence of these failures, they have been unable to vend the right to use their patent heretofore, and the short period which it has now to run presents no sufficient inducement to purchase it. Under these circumstances, the renewal of the patent was thought to be but an act of justice, without being in any way prejudicial to the public.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall be necessarily compelled to vote against this bill, not from any particular objection to the patent which is intended to be renewed by it, but on principle. I think that the Congress of the United States is a body unfit and utterly incapacitated to decide these questions of the renewal of patents. The Constitution of the United States grants to Congress the rights to pass laws for the purpose of "securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." That is the basis on which patent laws ought to be passed. Those laws should be general. You have passed general laws on the subject, and have determined that your rule shall be to grant a patent for fourteen years; and if, within that period of time, the party cannot make, without his own fault or neglect, a sufficient remuneration for the benefit of the discovery to the public, he is entitled, on application to judicial authority, to have an examination into the facts. That examination is not an ex parte hearing such as you have before a committee, but an examination, after previous public notice, by an authority competent to hear both the objections and the allegations in favor of and against the party asking the extension. After a fair judicial inquiry, from which there is a right of appeal, if the inventor establishes the main fact material to the extension of this patent, that, without his fault or neglect the discovery has been, from unavoidable causes, rendered useless to him, though one of great benefit to the public, his patent is to be extended for seven years more.

Now, sir, if it be true that this period of time is not sufficient to cover the cases of patents, you should alter your general laws, reform them, remodel them; and, if they are wrong, place them right. I am willing to go as far as any man to secure to inventors, as well as authors, the enjoyment of the exclusive use of their inventions and writings, to such an extent as will not trench upon the counter rights of the public. I am willing to secure to them the full and ample benefit which they ought to derive, by way of monopoly, for their inventions. I do not object to the exclusive use; but what the Constitution contemplates is, the exclusive use for limited periods of time, because it looked to this great principle, that the reason why you give the exclusive use is, that the party has conferred a benefit on the public by his discovery. Then, after you grant the exclusive use for a period of time, fourteen years, which you suppose to be the average period in which benefit may be derived by an inventor, you supply the further period of seven years, for all excepted cases; and for the purpose of ascertaining whether a particular case is an excepted one, you send the party to a judicial tribunal, in order to establish his right to the exception. When the general laws are so ample, why should you introduce special legislation? Why undertake to examine, by means of committees here, on one-sided and ex parte affidavits, into matters in which individual interest stands arrayed on the one side, and the unprotected public interest on the other?

Sir, in political bodies, constituted as Congress is, it is impossible, in the nature of things, that either Congress itself, or the members of a committee, should go into these judicial inquiries with the prospect of doing justice as between the public and the inventor or discoverer. Your committees meet at ten or eleven o'clock in the morning. They sit for an hour or two hours. Is that sufficient time to decide such important questions? Why, very important and delicate questions may arise in reference to the rights of the public. It is necessary to have a full and fair inquiry into the fact whether the party is entitled to a renewal of his patent, and it may be proper to ascertain whether that patent interferes with previous discoveries of others. All these matters should be inquired into. They would be inquired into, after full notice under your laws, if the question went before the proper tribunal appointed by those laws. Yet you supersede all that by special legislation; you suffer a party to come here without giving notice to adverse claimants; and if no one happens to observe that such an application has been made, it goes through Congress unopposed, on the mere ex parte statements of the applicant.

For my own part, I will never sanction a course of legislation of that kind. I believe that special legislation is the curse and bane of this country. Of course there are exceptions to all rules, but as a general rule, I wish it to be understood that I shall oppose all special legislation as to matters which are clearly subjects for judicial inquiry. Mr. President, what is the great principle which pervades not only the Federal Constitution, but the constitution of every State in the Union? It is a great, leading, and most important principle, that the exercise of legislative and judicial functions shall be kept separate. There is not a State in the Union whose constitution does not contain such a provision. It exists in reference to the organization of the powers of the Federal Constitution; and yet you are trampling upon that principle when you undertake here to examine into the particular case of any individual patentee, with a view to the renewal of his patent.

I cannot sanction action of this kind. Without making the slightest objection to this particular case, without going into any inquiry as to its merits, I must say that it seems to me, if the party had a right to the renewal of his patent, he could have gone, and should have gone, before the proper tribunal for the purpose of obtaining that renewal. If he failed to obtain that renewal, I am not willing to revise, by act of Congress, the judicial action of a tribunal appointed for purposes of judicial inquiry. If from any circumstances, for which we cannot account—and it must almost invariably be his own neglect—the party has chosen to place himself in a position in which he cannot avail himself of the judicial application, it is his fault, and the public have their rights against him.

I had intended, Mr. President, to cite some authorities which would probably have their influence upon the Senate upon the question of the extension of patents; but I was not aware that the question would come up to-day, and therefore I cannot go further into the subject. I shall, however, take occasion hereafter to show more distinctly and clearly to what extreme abuses the system of legislation which involves the consideration by a committee of the applications of particular patentees must give rise. I intend to attempt to show that it is a clear violation of the principles of the Federal Constitution, because it is an assumption by the legislative branch of the Government of duties which belong clearly and unquestionably to the judicial department.

In saying this, sir, I do not mean to say that the patent laws do not require revision. I think they do. I have entertained that opinion for some time. I think there are some remedies which patentees have not now to which they ought to be entitled. I will mention one. I think a patentee ought to have a right to have a final decision at once by some sort of proceeding in rem wherever his rights are infringed by any individual whatever, in proceeding against that individual by a bill in equity, or by any other proceeding which you may devise. He might be allowed to give notice in all the great cities of the Union, for a sufficient period of time, so that all other persons who chose to do so should come in and be made parties defendant for the purpose of objecting to that patent; but if none did so on the final hearing of that cause, there should be an authority on the part of the court to establish the validity of the patent as against the world. This would leave the inventor, as the result of his single suit, entitled in all future cases of infringement to do nothing but prove the damage which he incurred from the infringement. But the evil, and the great evil, under which every patentee labors now, that the proceedings of one suit res inter alios acta in every other suit except as between parties and privies; and he is obliged to fight his whole battle over again in every new suit, and men may thus be exhausted in the struggle, and their earnings from their inventions reduced to nothing from continued litigation.

I should, therefore, be willing to facilitate the rights of inventors by general laws, so far as I could. Nay, sir, I go further. I believe that the purposes of justice, the benefit to the inventor and to the public, would be greatly increased if you would prescribe a longer period of time for the original duration of the patent; that is to say, twenty-one years, and never permit a renewal in any case. The only basis of renewal must be that there are very extraordinary circumstances which justify it. The great principle in all patent laws ought to be that you grant to the patentee exclusive rights to the profits to be made from his discovery, for a limited period of time, within which, as applied to any discovery, a man of moderate, ordinary business capacity, with a careful use of the right which is given to him, would be able to obtain all the advantages to himself which consists in the correlative benefit of the public. That should be the principle of all patent laws. If you were to abandon the whole system of allowing even an extension of patents founded on a judicial inquiry, and to extend the original period of time to the utmost extent to which it may now be extended by judicial inquiry, I think it would be better for the public, and better for the individual patentee, than the provisions of the law as they now stand.

I am aware, Mr. President, that these remarks are somewhat irrelevant to the particular case before the Senate; but the bill connects itself with my general views of the whole system. The policy of legislation should be to shut the door against litigation, as far as it can. The policy of legislation, in order to prevent corruption, should be never to assume judicial powers in reference to an inquiry as to the facts of a particular case, where you have the rights of the public on the one hand, and the claims of individual inventors on the other.

I am sorry that I did not know this question was to arise, or I should have endeavored to give my views in a clearer form, and to sustain them by a reference to the opinions of some of the older and abler statesmen of the country, on the workings of the Government from its earliest origin. For the reasons which I have assigned, I shall be compelled to vote against this, or any other bill authorizing, or purporting to authorize, the action of Congress for special purposes, founded on a legislative inquiry into a matter which can alone be ascertained by judicial investigation.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Mr. President, I am not disposed to go into an argument in reference to the Senator's notions of general legislation; nor am I disposed now to examine the question whether this is a matter of judicial inquiry which ought never to have been brought here. All I desire to say is, that being a member of the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, and having examined the specimens of felt cloth presented by this man, in the various stages of improvement as to its texture and durability, I am satisfied that his patent should be extended, and that the bill ought to pass. I believe that, after hearing the evidence, the committee were unanimously in favor of the bill. If anybody dissented, I do not recollect who it was. We all agreed that the individual ought to have that description of relief which has been granted for years and years past to all inventors who have not been able within the time limited by law to procure a suitable reward for their inventions.

Whether fourteen or twenty-one years is a sufficient time for a duration of a patent, or whether any other number of years should be adhered to, as an inflexible rule, is a matter which I do not intend now to pass upon. In regard to the merits of this case, however, and of the propriety of the passage of the bill as reported, I think there can be no difficulty. The report which has been made by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. EVANS,] very clearly sets forth the facts of the case.

All I have to say in reply to the Senator from Delaware is, that I do not think it fair to pick out this individual and say, "we will now pass no special act, whatever is the merit of his claim; he must submit to the rules of general legislation which have not been applied to all other individuals." There have been almost innumerable acts of this nature passed by every Congress for years gone by. I do not think, then, that it is right to rein up this gentleman, and put to him a hard, iron rule in reference to special acts and special legislation, and apply to him a general principle which clips him off, when every day we are acting differently in regard to other individuals; and I think the fact that the committee were unanimous in reference to the merits of the bill, and the propriety of the measure itself, should be sufficient. In reference to the general principles suggested by the Senator from Delaware, I will not now discuss them. Upon a general bill they ought to be discussed, and perhaps I might then have something to say about them.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, there are two general principles for which I contended. I did not state the alterations in the patent laws, which I supposed would attain the purposes of justice, as an objection to this bill; but I did say, and I adhere to it, that the principle which lies at the foundation of your institutions is violated by the passage of such a bill as this; because by it you are trampling upon the exercise of judicial power, and substituting, contrary to the intent of the Constitution, a legislative inquiry into special facts; and whenever that arises I shall oppose it.

Now, the honorable Senator from Kentucky asks why I should select this particular bill when other cases have heretofore been allowed to pass? I am not aware how many cases have been passed heretofore. I have not seen any debate in which the question has been decided by Congress, whether or not this was an appropriate exercise of legislative power. These abuses creep in, step by step, one after another, until they are arrested. But if you are not to commence at some time, when the very next bill comes up, the same objection will apply. It will be said: Why should you commence now? But how are you ever to alter the principle unless you commence in some case? If we yield now, when every other case of special application for renewal of patents comes up, it will be said, Why Congress have done this for other patentees heretofore, and why not for this? You do not prevent that by general law. You prevent it by determining to abandon, if it has existed, a practice which is irregular in itself—a practice in the face of the intent of your own Constitution.

That is my objection to the bill. I do not object to the merits of the particular case. I do not doubt, as the Senator from Kentucky says, the committee were unanimous; but might I not ask the committee, "gentlemen, did you give public notice to the world that you were about to investigate the allegations in the petition of these claimants? Did you give any reasonable notice to the public that, at that hearing, any man might come forward and oppose it?" May not individuals say to us, "we have heard of no such notice; we have seen none?" Who, then, is the defendant—because it comes to that—on this application? The great public of the United States are on the one side, and the petitioner, on his statement of the facts, on the other. And what is the evidence? The evidence is ex parte. There can be no cross-examination. There are no parties in interest acquainted with the subject-matter, to enter into the inquiry. No counter-witnesses can be examined.

There is an individual interest to bring them here; and no notice has been given. Is this the mode in which a judicial inquiry, for the purpose of establishing an exclusive right of property for a period of seven or fourteen years, is to be passed upon by the Congress of the United States, when it refers, on one side, to the great interests of the public, and on the other, merely to the individual interests of the particular patentee? Sir, I cannot reconcile to my mind that this is an appropriate course of legislation. I cannot reconcile to my mind that it does not violate every principle of justice, and every principle of propriety; and therefore it is, be this the first or the last case, that I must object to it. I must object to it, because it represents the system of special legislation for the extension of a patent, which, I am satisfied, no matter how plausible a case may be made on an ex parte statement, can never do justice as between the party and the public.

Mr. President, I have, I admit, great want of confidence in ex parte statements. My life has been passed, with the exception of the two last years, entirely in forensic exertion, and I have, therefore, had some opportunity of studying the nature and character of human testimony and its biases. I have seen something, too, of the modes in which truth is to be elicited. I presume no one in this body pretends that if you want to get at the truth of particular facts, the mode in which an intelligent man would desire to do it would be to take the statement of a party alone, or to take that statement, supported by his own affidavits or the affidavits of those whom he chose to procure, when there was no one having a counter interest, either to bring counter testimony or to present the other view of the case; yet every man knows that a simple statement, and it may be a fair one, if made one-sided, may cover up, obscure, and leave out of view a great many material facts, which, if known, might change the whole view of it, and would establish the case on the other side.

For these reasons, I do not consider that my objection has been answered to my satisfaction, and I shall be compelled to vote against this bill. As I desire to know the sense of the Senate, I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the question of ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading; and I wish to know whether this system of legislation, which is said to exist, on judicial subjects, is to continue or not?

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, there is great force in what the Senator from Delaware says in regard to the abuses which may be made, and which I suppose it is possible have sometimes been made, of the power exercised by Congress for the extension of patents. I wish that it were not true; but it seems to me, we must take this as a practical question, and dispose of it in a practical way. Now, sir, the Constitution of the United States empowers Congress to advance the cause of science, philosophy, and learning, by extending to authors for a limited period the benefit of their inventions, discoveries, and writings. Congress has adopted a uniform system for that purpose; and in regard to inventions, has established a Patent Office, with a code of jurisprudence on the subject, by which it is intended and expected that, in the administration of that department, each inventor will, by obtaining a patent, secure the exclusive enjoyment of the property of his own invention for the term of fourteen years. If that system is perfect, so that the inventor does secure the enjoyment of the property for fourteen years, then it is altogether wrong for an inventor, having so obtained a patent, to come back to Congress for an extension of it, and equally wrong for Congress to entertain the question. But we have had experience upon that subject which has convinced us, and convinced the whole country, that that system does sometimes fail to secure to an inventor the property to which he is entitled by virtue of the Constitution. More than that, I think we are all satisfied that it fails very often. I do not know whether it would be safe to say that it fails in half or in a third of the cases, but I do know this, that a patent for an invention which is worthless is never assailed; whereas a patent for an invention which is good and valuable almost never escapes being assailed in the courts. The infringers constitute a large number of persons who can combine, and do often combine against the single person who is the inventor.

Now, sir, my mind runs through at once a catalogue of the most useful inventions which this country or the world has witnessed for the last half century, for which the patentee has received no adequate reward during the term of fourteen years secured to him by the patent, for the reason that the present patent law has been inadequate for that purpose. Take all the greatest inventions, those which stand out in the history of the country, and are identified with its progress, and I might say that there is scarcely one of them which effected the purpose of the letters patent within the term of fourteen years originally limited. I remember the patent of Jethro Wood, for the cast-iron plow, one of the greatest and most useful inventions of this age. It was extended to twenty-eight years, but Jethro Wood never, during all that time, even received an adequate reward. Without mentioning others, which might be invidious, this is the actual state of the case.

Now then because we have not been able either in this country or in Europe, owing to the intrinsic difficulties of the case, to establish a perfect and successful system of jurisprudence in regard to patents, meritorious inventors have come to Congress from an early period and have submitted their claims to Congress, and they have been investigated and meritorious patents have been extended for a period of seven or fourteen years. So general has been the acknowledgment of the soundness of that principle that Congress has heretofore amended the patent laws so as to provide for a system of retention at the Patent Office for a period of seven years.

Well now if the system, as thus amended, extending the patent seven years after the expiration of the original fourteen, always avoided, or, in a great majority of cases, avoided injustice, then it might be safe to reject a special application to Congress for the further extension of seven years, making the whole period twenty-eight years, because, being an individual case, it might be laid aside and overruled for the consideration that justice was effectually secured as far as possible by the general system; but our experience again shows us that this system of extension for the period of seven years beyond the original fourteen, has sometimes failed, and that it fails oftenest in those most meritorious cases where it is most important to the inventor, and most important to the cause of science and philosophy that the patent should be sufficient to cover a reward.

I regret as much as any one these defects in the patent law. I agree, in regard to that matter, with the honorable Senator from Delaware, with whom I am most happy to agree very often, especially upon questions of a judicial character; and if ever I differ from him, it is with profound deference to his opinions and judgment; but we must take the fact as it is. Our patent law is inadequate. There are cases of oppression which are the result of the patent law. We have a habit, a custom, of correcting occasionally instances of injustice by legislation here, where the regular administration of the law at the Patent Office has been insufficient. I am willing to go with the honorable Senator from Delaware, and I will go with him, in endeavoring to revise the patent law, so as to render it entirely unnecessary hereafter for inventors to come back to Congress after having exhausted the remedies given at the Patent Office; but until that can be done, how can we, with justice, select an individual case, and reject that, when that individual case is manifestly meritorious, and leave the system of special legislation to stand for the benefit of other cases which may be no more meritorious?

That is precisely this case. We have heretofore granted extensions to patentees, because of the defects in the administration of the Patent Office—defects arising from our present patent laws. We have established this practice. This application comes legitimately before us under it. No one raises a voice—no one whispers that this is not a useful and meritorious invention, or that the patentee was not the original and first inventor; and no one raises an issue with the committee upon the fact that he has not received that reward which the Constitution of his country declares shall be his for having made and perfected such an invention.

I hope, therefore, that, while we shall all believe, and while the strong argument of the Senator from Delaware will tend to convince us, that we should make a general amendment of the patent law, to provide against the necessity of a resort to special legislation, we shall still, in this instance, and in such others as come before us, pursue that system of special legislation wisely, carefully, and justly, until, by a general law, we have a revision of the whole system.

Mr. EVANS. As I reported this bill, it is perhaps proper for me to say something in relation to it. I perfectly agree with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] that a committee of the Senate is as unfitted to decide these matters as any tribunal of any kind that I know of, sitting, as they do, with evidence before them entirely ex parte. I have seen enough already in the committee to know, that in four cases out of five there is a deliberate and preconceived design to practice imposition. There is a concealment of profits; there is an exaggeration of benefits. In those cases I am prepared to go against the application. But in this particular case—although, if I had seen as much at the time as I have seen since, perhaps I might have looked upon it with more suspicion; I heard nothing but the statement of the parties—I was satisfied that it was one of those inventions in which the public were not likely to be injured, because it does not stand as a monopoly, but it comes in competition with every other manufacture of the same articles. The granting of this exclusive right will not enable these men to put up the articles which they manufacture at whatever price they please, and compel the public to pay it; but it will come in competition with every other specific manufacture. The invention is for making cloth by a new process. It is no better than the old process. It may be as good; if it is as good, and the people choose to buy it, very well; there is no danger that these men can extort too high a price for it, because the old process of manufacturing cloth by weaving comes in fair competition, and competition will keep down the price, and the public therefore cannot be prejudiced by it. As to the other matter of receipts and profits. I suppose from the specimens submitted to me—I had no other proof except their statements—and from the improvements which have been made within a few years in it, that the parties could not have derived much benefit from the patent until within a few years past. I should suppose that the fabrics manufactured before that were of a texture and appearance which rendered them not very salable in the market. I therefore—although I look upon these ex parte statements with a great deal of suspicion—thought it likely they had received no remuneration; and I am satisfied no injury can result from this to the public interest, because it will come in competition with other manufactures, which will keep down the price to the proper market value.

Mr. BAYARD. After the remarks of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, I will withdraw my call for the yeas and nays on this bill. I have entire confidence in his statement as to this particular case. It does not, however, alter my objection to the principle. I do not see why you should remedy a defect in your patent laws by such special legislation as this. But I desire to defeat this system of applications to Congress for renewals. The honorable Senator has shown us very well what it leads to. He is satisfied that, as a member of the committee, in four out of five of these cases which come before the committee, they are founded in attempted imposition. I desire to do away with it; but I will make the attempt upon some other bill on which I can get the Senate to go with me. I will therefore withdraw the call for the yeas and nays on this bill, though I cannot vote for it myself.

No amendment being proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate; was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McKean, Chief Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury and Light-House Board to determine upon the site, plan, and mode of constructing the light-house on Cohasset Rocks, and for other purposes.

Also, that the House had agreed to the report of the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill for the relief of the troops who were sufferers by the recent disaster to the steamship San Francisco.

ASBURY DICKINS.

On the motion of Mr. DAWSON, the bill for the relief of Asbury Dickins was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to require the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow him the compensation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of State, during the time while he was Chief Clerk in those Departments, that he performed the duties of those officers under appointment from President Jackson, deducting from the amount the compensation which he received as Chief Clerk.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

DAVID MYERLE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar is that for the relief of David Myerle.

Mr. GWIN. The member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. Thomson, of New Jersey,] who reported that bill, is absent. He requested that it might be laid over until he should be present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, if there be no objection.

THEODORE E. ELLIOTT.

The bill for the relief of Theodore E. Elliott was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to appropriate $300 to pay him in satisfaction of his claim for a keel-boat furnished to P. M. Butler, late agent for the Cherokees, and used in transporting supplies, under treaty, to the Indian territory, to be paid as other moneys disbursed by the Commissioner of Indians Affairs.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

MOORE AND HASCALL'S PATENT.

The bill for the relief of Hiram Moore and John E. Hascall was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to renew the patent of Moore and Hascall's harvesting machine, together with improvements, for fourteen years from June 27, 1850. The original patent was secured in 1836 but from the complex character of the invention much time was required to perfect it. And as it could only be tried once in each year, during the harvesting season, the whole period of the first patent was necessarily consumed in bringing it to the degree of perfection which it now possesses, and which gives it the capacity to cut, thresh, clean, and put into bags, wheat and other small grain, at the rate of three acres per hour. So that the said inventors have never sold a right, nor a single machine, nor from any other source received any remuneration whatever for an expenditure of time and money which they state, and which the committee believe, to be at least thirty thousand dollars.

Mr. DAWSON. I ask that the consideration of that bill be postponed on account of the absence of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Hunter,] who desires to debate it.

Mr. STUART. I only wish to state to the Senate a few considerations on this subject, and then, if they are disposed to postpone the bill, they can do so. This bill has passed the House of Representatives twice. It first passed the House during the long session of 1850, but it lay in the Senate, and was not taken up in consequence of the discussions on the slavery question, which involved pretty much the whole time of the Senate during that year. At the last Congress it passed the House of Representatives again, as early, I think, as the 4th of February in the first session. It remained in the Senate until the very last days of the second session of that Congress, when it was taken up and partially discussed; but in consequence of the extreme pressure of the public business, and the urgency of the appropriation bills, it was recommitted to the Committee on Patents and the Patent office. It has been reported again in both Houses at this session; but this is the first moment that it has been reached in either. Although I do not intend now to go into the discussion of the merits of the bill at all, I must say that I think it is one of the strongest cases which can be presented to the consideration of Congress, in every respect; and, inasmuch as the bill has been twice lost before, merely on account of postponements, I submit to the Senate whether it ought to be postponed now.

I do not wish to be misunderstood in respect to the courtesy due to the Senator from Virginia. If I believed that it was within his power to throw any light upon this question which cannot be done by many other Senators here present, I should not object for one instant to its postponement; but the question has been thoroughly investigated by several committees of both Houses of Congress. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. Dawson] himself, has investigated this question fully, and there are other gentlemen here who have examined it. There is, I submit, not a fact which can be presented by the Senator from Virginia, if he were here, that cannot also be presented by the Senator from Georgia. Now, sir, I think, and I mean to speak it with very great confidence, that the question does not involve those obligations of courtesy which, in this case, ought to require this bill to be postponed; because the circumstances under which it has been hitherto postponed and lost, seem to me to give it a claim on the consideration of the Senate. I barely wished to make this statement on the history of the bill; and now, if the Senate think it should be postponed, under the circumstances, why, as a matter of course, I must submit to it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, if it is the desire of the Senator from Virginia, who is now absent, to discuss or to make any remarks upon this bill, such is my esteem and regard for, and my entire confidence in, the judgment of that Senator, that I am very well satisfied he would not have made the request unless he believed he could throw some light upon the matter which we have to decide; and I shall therefore vote for this postponement from the confidence I have that he would never make a frivolous objection, and that he never would ask for the postponement of a bill affecting the rights of a party, unless he believed it was one on which he could throw some light. Under these circumstances, I shall vote for the motion to postpone.

Mr. WALKER. I am well aware that the Senator from Virginia is very anxious to be heard on this bill. I sit next to him, and there have been conversations between us in regard to it. I feel perfectly confident that it is the desire of the Senator from Virginia to address himself to this bill; and I am certain that it will be in his power to do so in a manner which will be interesting and instructive to the Senate. When the bill shall be up for final consideration I design to be heard upon it myself, if I can obtain that courtesy from the Senate; and I think that, humble as my capacity may be, I can satisfy the Senate again, as I believe they were satisfied at the last session, that this bill ought not to be passed in the shape in which it now is.

The Senator from Michigan says it passed the House early in the session of 1850, and was defeated then by the discussion of the compromise measures. I do not know what then caused its postponement; I do not remember what then defeated its consideration; but this much I can say to him, that I have in my hand now a copy of the bill which passed the House of Representatives at that time, and it is a very different affair from the bill which we are now called upon to pass. It passed, as he says also, at the last Congress, and was defeated here at the very last hours of the session, in consequence, as he thinks, of discussion upon the appropriation bills. I differ with the honorable Senator that such was the case; and I think I can recall to the mind of the Senator the circumstances under which this bill was disposed of then.

It will be remembered that at that time I addressed myself to the peculiar provisions of this bill, and that I pointed out what, in my estimation, consisted the impropriety of its provisions; and then, upon my own motion, the bill was recommitted. The reason was not that we had not time to consider it; for at first the great difficulty seemed to be to prevent its passage. Its recommitment, therefore, was not in consequence of the discussion on the appropriation bills. The bill was up for consideration, and its passage seemed inevitable; but on my motion, and after discussion, so improper was the form of the bill deemed, that it was not only sent back to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, but it was sent there with instructions to report it as a bill simply to extend the patent. Considering this vote, I must express my surprise that the bill is here, after that expression of opinion by the Senate, in the form in which we now see it. I supposed that the opinion then expressed by the Senate would be to some extent followed by the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office; but it seems they have disregarded the intimation given by the Senate at that time, and have deemed it best to bring the bill before the Senate in the form in which it was under consideration at the last session. I then said, and I say now, that I have no objection to voting at once, without a single word of explanation, for the mere extension of the patent of these gentlemen; and I had hoped the bill would come up and be passed without objection, in that form. We have just passed a bill to which the Senator from Delaware made objection, providing for a simple extension of a patent; but here is a bill of most extraordinary provisions, which it is now said, at the first time when it comes up at this session, may not be postponed for one week.

I desire it to be postponed for another reason. As I have said, I wish to address the Senate upon this bill; and when I do so, I wish to have before me a copy of the original patent of Moore and Hascall, in order that I may comment upon it, and upon the provisions of the bill in connection with it. I ask the Senator from Michigan that he will so favor me, or, if not me, the Senate, as to have in his possession when this bill shall come up again, the patent of Moore and Hascall, that we may have an opportunity to refer to it; and I hope he will not insist on the consideration of the bill at this time, when the patent is not here, and cannot be obtained readily, and when the provisions of the bill are most extraordinary, and the Senate has once before expressed its opinion upon those provisions so far as to recommit the bill for reconsideration to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, with instructions, if not express, at least implied, that it should be reported back as a bill simply extending the patent.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I was in favor of the bill which was under the consideration of the Senate for the relief of Moore and Hascall at the last session of Congress, and have seen no reason to change the opinion which I then entertained. But I hope there will be no difficulty, as I think there ought to be no difficulty, in agreeing to the postponement of the bill until next Friday, to allow the Senator from Virginia to be heard upon it. If the bill is right, it can stand the test of investigation. But if it is wrong, and if it can be shown to be wrong, those of us who have been in favor of it ought to have an opportunity of hearing the argument against it, so that we may retract our course if we have been in error. I hope there will be no difficulty about the postponement.

Mr. SEWARD. I have something to say upon the question of this bill now, as I have had heretofore; but it is within my knowledge that the Senator from Virginia has expected and designed to discuss this question, and, therefore, pursuing that courtesy which has always been extended, I believe, in such cases to any member of the Senate, and was this morning in regard to another case, I shall concur in the postponement.

Mr. STUART. I shall acquiesce in the disposition of the Senate in respect to the postponement of this bill; but, in doing that, I beg leave to ask the attention of the Senate for a moment while I correct a very great error into which the Senator from Wisconsin has fallen, and while I relieve the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, of which I am a member, from the inference at least, if not the direct charge, which is to be drawn from his remarks. I spoke what I said in the outset, not from what I had heard from others, but of what I saw and heard myself. I did not allude, and do not intend to allude, to the argument made by the Senator from Wisconsin. I stood here in the Senate and listened to it, and I was surprised that any Senator of his known intelligence should be so deeply in error as he was at that time in respect to this bill and its merits. What I said was strictly true. It was with difficulty that the chairman of the Committee on Finance could be prevailed on to allow this bill to come up when it did at that late period of the session; and it was only by strong im-portunities that he did consent. His reason for objecting was, that he considered the whole time of the session necessary for the consideration of the appropriation bills. He finally, however, did consent; and then the bill provoked, I think I may say, an angry discussion. The Senator from Wisconsin, I recollect, was peculiarly agitated, and said some strong things very strongly—much stronger, I thought, than the circumstances warranted. But the bill was recommitted without instructions. When the papers relating to it were at this session withdrawn from the files, on my motion, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, they were sent there with the mere indorsement on them that the case was "recommitted to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office." The Senator is mistaken in supposing that there was a single instruction. What might have been his inference, is quite another thing; but I assure him that the committee received it at the present session without any instructions from the former Senate at all.

I did not desire to say as much as I have said. All I wish, however, is simply that in the postponement of the question, it shall not be done with any prejudice upon the minds of Senators. I think the Senator from North Carolina is eminently correct when he says that this bill will bear the test of examination anywhere. All I ask for it is such a consideration as every such measure is entitled to in the Senate of the United States. Now, I am perfectly willing to consult the wishes of the Senate, and let the bill be postponed until next Friday. At that time I hope the Senator from Virginia will be here.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

A. J. WILLIAMSON.

The bill for the relief of Lieutenant A. J. Williamson was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to ascertain, from such competent evidence as may be submitted to them, the amount of property lost by Lieutenant A. J. Williamson, by the burning of the steamer South America, on the Mississippi river, in December, 1851, and the payment of the amount so ascertained, not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. Williamson, then a lieutenant in the United States Army, was ordered, in December, 1851, to conduct a detachment of one hundred recruits from Newport barracks, Kentucky, to San Antonio. On the 8th December they embarked on board the steamer South America for New Orleans. On the passage the vessel took fire, and was consumed, by which disaster fifteen of the recruits were drowned, and nearly all the clothing and baggage was consumed. Assistant Adjutant General Cooper, who was at that time in New Orleans, certifies to the truth of the facts stated, and says that "the Secretary of War directed, in April, 1851, that the lost articles should be replaced without cost" to the recruits. It seems, therefore, but just that Lieutenant Williamson should also be remunerated.

An adverse report has been previously made in the case, but aside from the additional evidence now produced, the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, made at the first session of the last Congress, in the case of the petty officers and seamen on board of the United States steamer Missouri, at the time of her destruction by fire at Gibraltar, which was sustained by the action of the Senate, seems to have settled the rule for such cases in favor of the petitioner—the Senate having passed the bill for the remuneration of the officers and seamen of the Missouri, for losses occurring under analogous circumstances.

No amendment being proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

DEMPSEY PITTMAN.

The bill for the relief of Dempsey Pittman was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to require the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to audit and settle his account against the United States, for his military services in Florida, in the year 1838, and pay him such compensation and allowances as may be found to be justly due him, with the provision, however, that the amount shall in no case exceed the pay of a colonel of infantry for five months.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

WILLIAM P. S. SANGER.

The bill for the relief of William P. S. Sanger was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to pay him the same rate of compensation for the time he was employed as engineer at the Norfolk navy-yard as was allowed by the act of Congress, approved the 28th of September, 1850, to James Heron, for services which he had rendered at the Pensacola navy-yard.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL AENEAS MACKAY.

The bill for the relief of Mrs. Helen Mackay, administratrix of Lieutenant Colonel Aeneas Mackay, late a deputy quartermaster in the United States Army, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling the accounts of Lieutenant Colonel Aeneas Mackay, deceased, deputy quartermaster general in the United States Army, shall allow, as a credit for $25,000, the receipt of Captain William D. McKissack for that amount, dated the 1st of May, 1847, as well as the receipt of Captain McKissack for a similar amount, dated the 14th of August, 1847; and that the Secretary of the Treasury pay to Mrs. Helen Mackay, administratrix of Colonel Aeneas Mackay, deceased, whatever balance may be found to be due to her late husband, upon a final settlement of his accounts.

Colonel Mackay was deputy quartermaster general in the United States Army, stationed at St. Louis, Missouri, in 1847, where he disbursed large sums of money on account of the Mexican war. In the settlement of his accounts at the Treasury Department, in 1847, he was credited in his second quarterly account by $25,000 paid by him to Captain McKissack, as per receipt dated May 1, 1847—and in his third quarterly account of the same year he was credited by $25,000, also paid to Captain McKissack, as per receipt dated August 14, 1847, and upon a final statement of his account he is shown to have a balance to his credit, on the books of the Treasury Department, of about $7,000.

Colonel Mackay was in the city of Washington, from February to September, 1848, engaged in the settlement of his accounts, and claiming payment of the balance due him, which however was not paid him up to the time of his death in 1850. Since his death, his widow has repeatedly applied to the Department for a final settlement of his accounts; when, much to her surprise, she was informed that, upon a re-examination of Colonel Mackay's accounts, the receipt dated May 1, 1847, had been rejected, and that her husband was a defaulter about $18,000. The reason advanced by the Department for rejecting this voucher is, that Captain McKissack makes no return of it in his accounts, and it is alleged that these two receipts, each for $25,000, are for the identical sum of money.

The existence of the receipts in the hands of Colonel Mackay are prima facie evidence that both amounts were paid over by Colonel Mackay, and both received by Captain McKissack, and their possession would entitle Captain McKissack to a verdict in any court of justice. The committee also find the most abundant and satisfactory proof that the $25,000, for which Captain McKissack gave the receipt of May 1, 1847, was paid to him, and do not think that Colonel Mackay should be made to suffer for the neglect of another officer.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. WALKER. I would inquire of the Senator who reported the bill whether there was any proof which tended to satisfy the committee that, in point of fact, the two receipts were not for the same sum of money? If there is no proof that they were for different sums, we may find ourselves in this difficulty: by directing the accounting officers to settle with Colonel Mackay, and to allow him for both the sums, Captain McKissack, not having made any return, of course will have them charged to him; and we may find that he will come forward and ask us to relieve him against the defalcation which will be found standing against him for the $25,000.

It occurs to me that we ought to be pretty well satisfied that these were really for different sums of money, and that the charge will result justly against Captain McKissack. Unless we take care of that matter, I cannot see why it will not be inevitable that we shall have to settle the matter with Captain McKissack hereafter. I am in hopes that there was proof to satisfy the minds of the committee that they were for different sums of money.

Mr. BADGER. I suggest to my friend from Wisconsin, that from the report it appears that they were for different sums. One of them was paid and receipted for on May 1, 1847, and the other on August 14, 1847. That, I suppose, is prima facie evidence that they were different sums.

Mr. WALKER. Suppose that hereafter Captain McKissack is charged with these sums—for he must be charged with them; it is alleged in the report that he made no return of them—and he shall then come forward and show, that in point of fact the two receipts were for the same sum of money, notwithstanding they were given on different days? When he shows that, of course we must relieve him, having already relieved Mackay. It is true it will be for Captain McKissack to show that they were for the same sum; but if he does show that, we shall certainly have to relieve him, as we have already relieved Mackay, and the consequence will be that the Government will be the loser.

Mr. BADGER. The difficulty with my friend from Wisconsin seems to be this: he fears to do justice to Colonel Mackay, because we may hereafter have to settle with Captain McKissack. May we not leave that matter for the future? They must have a rule at the Department—

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I recollect very distinctly when this case was called up and discussed. It was discussed and examined at very considerable length by the committee, and they were unanimous in their report, and became thoroughly and entirely satisfied of the correctness of the matter. I was present at the time; but as I cannot go on now to explain it, because the facts and circumstances have escaped my attention since it was before the committee; and as there is not time to go into the study of it so as to be able to explain it now, and as the chairman of the committee, who is more familiar with it, and the Senator who reported the bill are not present, I propose that it should go over until next Friday.

Mr. BADGER. I do not believe that my friend from Wisconsin objects to the passage of the bill. I therefore suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that the postponement is not necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON. There was no question in the committee whatever as to the justice of the claim, after a full discussion of the subject. The amount is not properly chargeable to Mackay at all.

Mr. WALKER. I make no opposition to the bill. I only called the attention of the Senate to the difficulty that might arise.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

WILLIAM R. NEVINS.

The bill for the relief of W. R. Nevins was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to suspend so much of the eighteenth section of the act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts heretofore made for that purpose," passed the 4th of July, 1836, as prohibits the extension of a patent after the expiration of the term for which it was originally issued, so far as shall be necessary to authorize the renewal of a patent to William R. Nevins, of the city of New York, for his invention of what is denominated in his former letters patent a certain machine for "rolling and cutting crackers and biscuit," dated March 2, 1836, and reissued May 9, 1848.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I am totally opposed to this bill, which is for the purpose of allowing a renewal of this patent of Mr. Nevins. It seems that he has made some invention about rolling biscuits, and the purpose of this bill is to repeal some clause of a law which, in its general operation, prevents him from getting a renewal of that patent. I am not for continuing any obstruction in the mode on which biscuits are made. They are very good, useful, and wholesome things, and I do not want the housekeepers of this Union, and particularly the housekeepers in my country, sued in the Federal courts for the purpose of recovering damages because they have made biscuit upon a plan invented by Mr. Nevins or anybody else. If he has had a patent, and has had the use of it for the time the law allows, let him avail himself of his rights. If, under the existing law he has the right to a renewal, let him get a renewal; but I have no idea of cumbering all the operations of domestic cookery in the country by passing special acts of Congress to enable men who have invented some machine for making biscuit or bread in a particular way, to hold persons responsible who use it in the ordinary process of domestic cookery.

Mr. SEWARD. Let the report of the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office be read.

The report was read, from which it appears that letters patent for the invention were granted on the 2d of March, 1836, and would have expired on the 2d of March, 1850; their validity was disputed, as is so often the case; and in the course of the litigation it was decided by the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York that they were void, by reason of defects in the specification and claim. This discovery was made in 1847. The petitioner applied to the Commissioner of Patents, according to law, for a reissue upon an amended specification and claim, and they were, upon a full examination at the Patent Office of the merits of the question, reissued on the 9th of May, 1848, to continue in effect only till the day limited in the original letters patent, viz: the 2d of March, 1850. On the 17th of March, 1850, the patentee applied to Congress for an extension of his patent for fourteen years. The original disputants of his invention remonstrated, and the question was then in litigation. The Committee on Patents and the Patent Office reported adversely on the petition. But on the 6th day of November, 1851, the question thus litigated was brought to a trial in the same circuit court, which resulted in a verdict and judgment, establishing the petitioner's title to the invention, the validity of the patent, and the usefulness of the invention also; since that time all these points have remained unquestioned.

The case submitted also shows, that while the petitioner has expended in and about perfecting and establishing his invention $4,616 84, he has received from it only $2,055; so that he has actually suffered a loss, from causes involving no fault or misconduct on his part, of $2,561 84, instead of having received an adequate remuneration for the time and labor and money expended in perfecting his invention.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, "Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading."

Mr. BAYARD. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BADGER. Let us have the yeas and nays by all means, and see who is for incumbering the making of biscuit.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWSON. Two years ago I made a report in this case similar to the one which has been read. As a general proposition, I am against the extension of patents, and I believe I have voted but for two cases of extension. This, I think, is a very meritorious case, and should form an exception to that general rule. This man, on his way to New Orleans, was injured very severely. He expected to return here within the proper time to procure an extension of his patent according to law; but his misfortune delayed him so that he could not reach here in time; a letter from him preceded him, stating the facts. He could not make the necessary statement at the office in consequence of this accident, until the time acquired by law had passed by; and when he reached here he found that he was deprived of his right by the loss of a few days. He had presented his petition to this body. It happened at the time to be a member of the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office; and, seeing the facts, I thought the case should be an exception to the general rule which I had pursued; and therefore I made a favorable report upon the claim.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I will say but a few words in addition to what the Senator from Georgia has stated. This patent does not interfere with any domestic institution whatever anywhere. The manufacture of this article is a large operation in great cities for all the purposes of society. It interferes with nobody in his private affairs. It benefits everybody in domestic life, because it is an invention which has cheapened the use of a very important article. The report shows that this man, after making a useful invention, by no loss of his own, through the mere defect of the patent laws, in a period of fourteen years, has failed to receive an indemnity; that he has expended $4,616 84 in perfecting his invention, and has received but $2,055 in return; that he was prevented from appearing at the Patent Office within the time necessary to make the application by an accident. The extent of this bill is to take away, in this particular case, the rule which required him to apply within a certain time, and refers the whole subject to the Patent Office. There is no question about his title or the validity of his patent, and none as to the utility of the invention.

One word more, and I hope that will soften the heart of my friend from North Carolina; and if it does not, I know it will soften the hearts of other Senators. This worthy man came here in the year 1850, and laid his case before the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Clay,] who presented it to the Senate in a speech, and who urged the committee of the Senate to a favorable examination of it. Last year the bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, and unanimously passed this House, but was lost in the other House, for want of being reached in time, I presume. This year the applicant came here at the beginning of the session to present his claim. He brought it to me; it was submitted to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, and they have unanimously reported in favor of it. When I next saw him, I found him recovering from a severe accident which had befallen him. Though a perfectly temperate and sober man, he had fallen into one of the cellar-ways in this city, and broken his jaw bone; and he has gone home a cripple. I hope, under these circumstances, that my honorable friend will withdraw his opposition to the bill.

Mr. BADGER. If the Senator from New York can show me that the allowance to this man of an opportunity to get an extension of his patent will not interfere with our people of the South making biscuit, and will not involve us in litigation in the courts of the United States, I will withdraw the objection, and leave the several manufacturers of biscuit at the North to fight the matter out among themselves. But, sir, that Senator has been to the South himself, and he knows that biscuit is a food used by us there. Everybody uses biscuit in all the walks of life, rich and poor, black and white. Now, I will never give my consent to extending a patent, in virtue of which any man may come to our country, and harass our people, because they make biscuit to eat, alleging that they have got some idea, or notion, or fancy of making them in a manner for which he has a patent right; but if he can assure me that it does not affect any of the operations of domestic cookery at all, in any shape or form, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. SEWARD. I can so assure the honorable Senator. It applies to the manufacture only on a large scale, for commerce. Everybody, North and South, East and West, throughout the whole extent of the country, will have an unquestionable right to make biscuit for their own use, and eat them, too, without being at all interfered with by this patentee. Now, will the honorable Senator withdraw his objection?

Mr. BADGER. I am satisfied.

Mr. ADAMS. Before the vote is taken, I wish to say that I agree with the remarks of my friend from North Carolina most fully. It is said this is a discovery of the patentee for making the best biscuits. Now, if it be so, he must have got his invention from Mrs. Bobo, of Alabama, for she certainly made better biscuit than anybody in the world. I do not conceive that we should extend this privilege to this individual; for I can prove by my friend from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY.] who sits beside me, and by any man who ever stayed at Mrs. Bobo's house, that she makes better biscuit than anybody else in the world; and if this man has the best plan for making biscuit, he must have got it from her. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEWARD. I can remove the honorable Senator's objection. The bill does not propose to extend the patent. It only removes a difficulty which stands in the way in the examination of the question at the Patent Office, whether he is entitled to an extension or not, he having been disabled from coming in time; and the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Alabama can go and taste his biscuit, if they choose.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 11; as follows:—

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Chase, Dawson, Evans, Everett, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Hamlin, Jones of Iowa, Mason, Morton, Pettit, Sebastian, Seward, Stuart, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Williams—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Clay, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Gwin, Johnson, Pearce, Rusk, Slidell, and Thomson of New Jersey—11.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read a third time, and passed.

JOHN BRONSON.

The bill for the relief of John Bronson was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It appropriates $2,915 18 to indemnify John Bronson, of the city of Detroit, for the loss of merchandise which fell into the hands of the enemy in consequence of the impressment, by order of an officer in command of a detachment of United States troops, of the wagons and teams with which that merchandise was being removed to a place of safety, at the time of the evacuation of Fort George, in the year 1813.

Mr. BAYARD called for the reading of the report of the Committee of Claims, and it was read.

It appears that in 1834 Mr. Whittlesey, from the Committee of Claims of the House of Representatives, made an adverse report on the same claim, on the ground that the testimony then before the committee did not fix the day on which the loss occurred; and that the testimony of the officer making the impressment was not adduced, nor that of other officers cognizant of the facts. The committee, therefore, came to the conclusion that "as far as the circumstances in the case are disclosed," they did not bring the case within the principles previously recognized. At the next session of Congress, the affidavit of Joseph G. Odale, deputy quartermaster in the service of the United States, and personally cognizant of all the material facts, was produced, in which he says: "Being on a retreat from Fort George, in Upper Canada, and at a place called Salt Battery, at Youngstown, on the Niagara river, in the State of New York, the American troops, at that place, overtook a number of loaded teams, among which were two wagons and horses, loaded with merchandise, belonging to John Bronson. All of said teams were impressed into the service of the United States, by order of Colonel C. Hopkins, then in command of the United States troops, and the goods of said Bronson were taken from the wagons and left in the public road, and said wagons immediately loaded with the baggage of the United States troops and moved on; the enemy being near, in pursuit of said United States troops, the property of said Bronson must have fallen into their possession." The deponent adds that Colonel Hopkins is dead. He estimates Mr. Bronson's loss at $2,000 or more.

In full view of the circumstances, as set forth and established by this and other competent testimony, it appears that property to a considerable amount belonging to the claimant, who was at the time a sutler in the service of the United States, was placed by his direction in wagons, for the purpose of conveying it to a place of security at the time when Fort George was evacuated by the American troops.

It further appears that whilst the wagons so employed were on their route, they were overtaken by a military force commanded by an officer of the United States, and pressed into the public service; and that the property of the claimant was left on the road, with the enemy approaching, and was lost to him.

The claimant submits a detailed schedule of the goods lost, specifying the quantity or weight of each item, with the market value, which he verifies by oath, amounting to $2,915 18; and that sum, without interest, the bill proposes to pay.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have had no opportunity to examine the particulars of this bill; but I am aware of the general fact that there is a disposition to bring up all these old claims, which, since the year 1817, were either acted upon, or might have been acted upon, under the general laws of Congress, if the parties had chosen to produce them when there were living witnesses for their full investigation. There is a disposition now to bring them up on testimony obtained after the lapse of twenty-five or thirty years.

Sir, in my examination of that class of cases arising out of injuries during the war of 1812-'14, I find that under general laws Congress authorized a commissioner to examine into all classes of injuries, specifying them in the law where it was thought proper relief should be granted. They further provided that the President of the United States might make such rules and regulations as were proper for the purpose of taking testimony in relation to the claims which were presented before the commissioner. Great numbers of claims were made. The then President of the United States, Mr. Madison, and the then Secretary of War, Mr. Crawford, were the authors of those rules and regulations. Amongst others they established one rule which I believe to have been of the highest importance, and one which, if this bill be now passed, it was nugatory to have established then. That rule required, in reference to the action of the troops of the United States, that the testimony of the commanding officer under whose authority the act was done should be given, or not being given should be accounted for.

Now, it is very evident that this rule was necessary, essentially necessary, because the Government is not responsible for the illicit destruction of property by soldiers, even of the United States, without orders—wanton trespasses of soldiers. That principle was conceded then, and I presume it will hardly be denied now, but if the act was done under the authority of the commanding officer, under an emergency of war, the Government held and holds itself responsible. Hence his testimony, if he was living, was requisite, because he was the proper person to give such an order; but if the party can lay by for twenty, or thirty, or fifteen, or ten years, until that officer be dead, and then come forward and tell you, by secondary evidence, that that officer's testimony cannot be procured now, the result is, that it was folly to establish such a rule, because the more remote the transaction the less probability there is of getting at the truth of the facts. If this course be permitted, a party has only to lay by, so that some time may elapse, and the testimony of the commanding officer cannot be obtained. I am not willing, therefore, to admit this case on the ground of delay, or defective application, unless the claimant can show me that this testimony could not be obtained at the time when the original petition was presented, because I regard the testimony as materially and absolutely essential. If Senators will take the trouble to examine they will find that there are cases in which testimony has been presented to a committee tending to show that the commanding officer was dead when he was actually alive. I recollect one case distinctly, relating to a claim which may possibly hereafter come before the Senate, in which a bill had actually been reported by the committee to the Senate; but the commanding officer, who was alleged to have given the order, having heard of the grounds upon which the bill was put, wrote a letter to the committee, stating that he had never given such an order as was contended, and that no such acts had taken place under any direction of his, as was alleged in the petition. That letter appears on the public records. In consequence of it the bill was rejected.

It follows of necessity that if you can dispense with that evidence which was necessary at the time, by the party laying by until the death of the officer takes place, you are rendering that rule which was then established entirely nugatory.

Again, Mr. President, when that law was passed, as a general law, it provided a proper mode of adjudicating upon these claims of all kinds. There was no want of notice. The regulations and the modes of proof were all published for six weeks, under the orders of the President, in every newspaper which published the laws of the United States. The public records show that if this party had just claims he was bound to come in before the commissioner. There was a period of two years allowed to the commissioner; but he transcended his authority, as to some branches of relief, and reported so loosely that the President became alarmed at the extent to which he would involve the interests of the Government, from what he supposed to be an improper construction of the law, and hence he suspended the execution of the commission until Congress could act further upon the subject. Congress did then reform the law of 1816, and ultimately transferred from the commissioner the performance of the duties under the law to the Treasury Department. The cases were heard there. All those who chose to make claims came before the Department and made them. They were reported upon and acted upon—either rejected or admitted. The pressure, however, was so great that, subsequently, Congress again passed a general law, in which they authorized an extension of time.

The first law was limited in its operation to March, 1818 or 1819—I do not recollect which. Congress then extended the provisions of the laws of 1816 and 1817 to cases which had been previously presented, and undetermined and undisposed of for a period of nine months, and referred them to the Treasury Department for decision, and they were all acted upon under that second law. From that time there is no doubt that there have been, here and there, private cases which have crept through, founded upon what is called additional testimony, which means nothing more than cumulative testimony, or that species of testimony which arises in ex parte representations from the lapse of time, dispensing with testimony which would have been essential under the original law, and essential not as a technical requisite, but in order to ascertain the true state of the facts.

Under these circumstances, Mr. President, I cannot, as at present advised, vote for this bill. Possibly, if I were to examine the case minutely I might alter my opinion in relation to it; but from the mere cursory reading of the report a Senator is not able to give to it the examination which he would desire. I am opposed to it on these general grounds. When the bill was before Congress years ago it was rejected. From my own experience, in the examination of these cases, I have found that what is called additional testimony is, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, nothing more than cumulative testimony; and that, too, when the facts of the case, by lapse of time, have passed from the memory of man, or when the still greater change occurs, that lapse of time has ripened into fact that which originally was mere impression or hearsay. The lapse of time sometimes, by constant impression on the mind of the witness, ripens into fact what before was but hearsay, and swears positively to that which he would probably have stated at first only hearsay information. This is necessarily incident to the defects of humanity, arising from the ravages which time will make in the human memory and the human intellect, no matter how bright may be either the one or the other.

Under the circumstances I cannot vote for this bill. It was rejected formerly by Congress, and I am not prepared to overturn that decision on any statement which I see of additional testimony, or any proof, that the testimony which the law required, and required in the soundest principles of justice, could not be obtained at the time when the claim was originally presented. If it was not obtained in consequence of the defect of the party, that is his own fault; and it would be an entire delusion to permit him now, when years have gone by, to waive testimony which was considered essential then, when it has arisen from his own neglect that it was not procured.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I reported this bill from the Committee of Claims, but I do not know that I can say anything which will more satisfactorily explain the case to the Senate than the report explains it, for the report was made deliberately, in full view of the testimony in the case. But, sir, the Senator from Delaware makes a general argument against a class of cases. He does not look to the evidence in this case. He does not touch other than general principles. He does not examine the particular case, but he strikes at the class. Now this case grows out of the war of 1812. There were laws passed from time to time, whereby, no doubt, such cases might have been adjusted if the parties had been vigilant. Those laws continued, expired, and were revived again; but finally there were a great many cases where, undoubtedly, when the parties had not obtained redress under existing laws, they had constantly to seek special redress whenever they were able to make out satisfactory cases.

I remember very well a somewhat similar case—I do not remember the name of it, perhaps the Senator from Delaware does—arising in this District. I do not remember the names of the persons, but I know a bill was reported and passed both branches of Congress. It was a case where a man had his property on wagons for the purpose of taking it beyond the reach of the enemy at the time this city was invaded by the British. The officers in command of the United States troops pressed the wagons into the service, unloaded the man's goods, and put those of the United States' on board, and the man's goods were entirely lost. In that case we gave redress. It was precisely such a case as this, with this difference only, that that claimant lived here, then, at the seat of Government, where he might have availed himself easily of all the laws then in force. This case arose on the frontier, at that time an utter wilderness, remote from the place where the claimant could seek redress, and where he was very likely not to prosecute his claim with great diligence. The testimony here was entirely satisfactory to the committee, at least to show that this man, being a sutler in the Army, having a warrant for that purpose, had provided teams for transporting his property out of the reach of the enemy, which he undoubtedly could have done if the officers had not interrupted him. The proof is that the teams were pressed into the service, under the order of the United States commanding officer, to carry United States military stores, &c. They unloaded his goods by the side of the road, where they were lost, in consequence of that order undoubtedly.

When the case first came up it was thought that the evidence was not entirely satisfactory, and the claimant finally obtained the testimony of the officer who executed the order. I think no one can read the testimony and doubt that the loss did accrue in consequence of the order of the United States officer; that it was to the injury of the claimant; and that the Government is justly responsible for it. I can see a very good reason, to which I have already alluded, why it was not prosecuted with that vigor that it might have been and ought to have been. Persons living on the extreme frontier, in a remote wilderness, before the means of traveling were such as they are now, could not very well prosecute a claim with the same facility that they can now.

All that I wish to say now is that the evidence in this case was entirely satisfactory to the whole committee. It is analogous to the case where we have given relief before; and, in our judgment, it proceeds upon the same principle. We ought not to take one man's claim and grant it, and refuse another which is founded on the same principle. If the evidence does not prove the claim that is one thing; but if it does prove it, and we gave redress to another man on a similar claim, we ought to give it to him. The former case to which I have alluded was under consideration, and discussed a long time, before we established the rule. Having established it, I should be very sorry to give one man of justice to one man and another to another man.

Mr. BAYARD. I am not aware of any rule established by the Senate. It is very true that the committee may be unanimous in this case; but who does not understand—not the people, but Congress; the people know nothing about it—that all the investigation in each private claim is referred to some individual member, who looks into the testimony. He may be a man who chooses to examine it with care, or he may be one who gives it a very slight examination. He may be a man who will take the trouble to examine the facts and affidavits, and scan them in his mind, and detect the deficiency of the testimony; or he may be a rather careless man, who is disposed, from kindness of heart if you please, or any other cause, to take for granted the statements made; and it may be, as is constantly the case, for it is not a judicial inquiry, that he will suffer himself to be assailed outside, and take the representations of agents and other interested actors for the parties. But there is not a man around me who does not know, that in all these private claims, unless there is some great objection to them, they are literally acted on on the recommendation of a single member of a committee, so far as the examination of the testimony goes. They come before you with the apparent weight of the recommendation of the whole committee; but every one knows that in point of fact the whole committee probably did not even look at the testimony. I admit that I think the system a vicious one. I hope Congress will remedy it by the appointment of a proper tribunal for the investigation of these claims. I am as anxious as any man that justice shall be done to the individual claimant, who has a just claim against the United States; but, at the same time, I think, under the present system, there is anything but justice done.

As regards the rule of which I spoke, which was established under the general laws of 1816 and 1817, the last passed in 1817, I consider it essential. As I heard the report read in this case, it certainly does not remove the necessity for the application of that rule—that is, it does not give the testimony of the officer who gave the order. That was the rule published throughout the whole country for the benefit of the persons who claimed compensation for injuries by order of a United States officer. The report here neither gives that testimony, nor does it show the fact that that testimony could not have been procured at the time when the laws were in force. If the party does neither the one nor the other, in my view of these things, justice to the United States requires us to say, "You have chosen to abandon your rights, and we will not now, after the lapse of forty years from the occurrence of the transaction, take the memory of a person who did not give the order." I should like very well to have time to examine the evidence in this case. I would like it on this account: It is admitted that it was formerly reported upon adversely, when the facts and transaction were more recent, by a committee quite as capable of investigating its real merits as we are now. I shall therefore move the postponement of the bill. If I find, on examination, that I do not think I can resist successfully the evidence and statement of facts as they existed in the former petition and the former report, when the transaction was more recent, I shall, of course, have to abandon my objection. I therefore move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Friday next, to give me an opportunity of looking into it.

Mr. WADE. The honorable Senator says that the applicants and their agents often crowd around us, and make representations to the member having the cases in charge, which representations are relied upon. I do not know that they do. In this case, however, I know that no such thing occurred.

Mr. BAYARD. I did not mean the remark to apply to this individual case for one moment. I never indulge in anything of the kind. If I thought so I would speak directly so as to be understood; for I never mean, by indirection, to make a remark to reflect upon the action of a particular Senator.

Mr. WADE. I do not know the claimant in this case. I never saw him. I know nothing but what appears from the evidence. The papers were referred to me; I examined them; and being convinced that the teams were pressed into the service by order of the United States officer I thought the compensation justly due. Under the instructions of the committee I reported the bill. Having done my duty to the case, I will leave it in the hands of the Senate. I will not object to the postponement.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

PETITION.

Mr. DAWSON, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Jane Irwin, praying to be allowed additional pay and bounty land, on account of the services of her father, the late Colonel Jared Irwin, during the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

REPORT FROM STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. SLIDELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a message of the President in relation to the subject, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the claimants of the private armed brig General Armstrong; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

THOMAS H. SUMNER.

The bill for the purchase of the copyright of a work published by Thomas H. Sumner, wherein he describes his new method of ascertaining a ship's position at sea, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that, in consideration of the transfer to the United States of the copyright of a work wherein Thomas H. Sumner fully describes his new method of ascertaining a ship's position at sea, when a meridian observation of the sun cannot be obtained, there be paid the sum of $10,000, for which the copyright shall be deemed extinct, and the book may hereafter be published, as if no such right had existed.

At the request of Mr. EVANS the report of the Committee on Commerce was read. Thomas H. Sumner is a master mariner. He is now insane; and, in consequence, his wife and children have failed to realize from such an important discovery as the one which he made the reward which it merits. Sumner, some years ago, published a work, giving an account of the discovery, and inviting the scrutiny of ship-masters and ship-owners. The committee present the testimony of many well known ship-owners and masters, naval officers, and distinguished mercantile and seafaring men, all attesting the value of the discovery; and, in the opinion of the committee, it is proved: 1st, that Sumner discovered the method; 2d, that it was before unknown; and 3d, that it is useful.

Mr. BAYARD. There is very pretty reading in that report, but it strikes me that it is very little calculated to strengthen our minds as to the real merits of the case. The discovery, if it is of the value which it is stated in the report to be, must be embodied, I suppose, in some mode which, without the publication of this book, which is copyrighted, could not be used by the master or officers of any ship. If that be so, I presume, with the extended commerce of the United States, the purchase of a copyrighted book on so invaluable a discovery would necessarily afford a compensation to the party; and it looks to me very much as if this was an attempt to substitute congressional compensation to a large amount for a discovery of limited and doubtful value. I cannot, with my impressions, vote for the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; and, on a division, on the question of its engrossment for a third reading, no quorum voted.

Mr. HAMLIN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Brown, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Everett, Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Houston, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Pearce, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Williams—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Bayard, Clay, Dawson, Evans, Fitzpatrick, and Mason—8.

So it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. It was read a third time, and passed.

A. C. W. FANNING.

On the motion of Mr. BADGER, the bill for the relief of the executrix of the late Brevet Colonel A. C. W. Fanning, of the United States Army, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Mrs. Harriet O. Read $7,230, the amount claimed by her to be due to the estate of Colonel Fanning as commission for disbursements made by him in 1827 and 1828 at the United States arsenal in Augusta, Georgia, and as balance of his accounts against the United States, for services rendered in 1818 and 1824, as United States commissioner in receiving and restoring St. Marks, and as Indian Agent at Forts Gadsden and St. Marks, from April 1818 to December 1821.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendments, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

KEOKUK AND DUBUQUE, IOWA.

On motion of Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, and by unanimous consent, the bill to constitute Keokuk, in the State of Iowa, a port of delivery, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to make Keokuk a port of delivery in the collection district of New Orleans, and makes the usual provisions for the appointment of a surveyor of customs.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. If my colleague has no objection, I move to amend the bill by adding to it Senate bill (No. 207) to constitute Dubuque a port of delivery, as an additional section.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I have no objection. Both have been reported from the Committee on Commerce unanimously, and both have the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The two points are a hundred miles apart.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. Then I move to amend the bill by adding the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, shall be, and is hereby, constituted a port of delivery, and shall be subject to the same regulations and restrictions as other ports of delivery in the United States; and there shall be appointed a surveyor of customs, to reside at said port, who shall, in addition to his own duties, perform the duties and receive the salary and emoluments of surveyor, prescribed by the act of Congress, approved on the 2d of March, 1831, providing for the payment of duties on imported goods at certain ports therein mentioned, entitled "An act allowing the duties on foreign merchandise imported into Pittsburg, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, Nashville, and Natchez, to be secured and paid at those places," and the said city of Dubuque, and the said port of delivery be, and is hereby, annexed to, and made part of, the port of New Orleans, and all the facilities and privileges afforded by said act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1831, be, and are hereby, extended to the said port of Dubuque.

The amendment was agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Iowa, its title was amended, so as to read, "A bill to constitute Keokuk and Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, ports of delivery."

SOLAR COMPASS.

The engrossed bill to enable the United States to make use of the solar compass in the public surveys was read a third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 10, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE SEIZURE OF THE BLACK WARRIOR.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution of inquiry. The property of a portion of my constituents has been confiscated by virtue of a foreign Power, under circumstances, as they now appear, of great aggravation. This is a question which concerns not only my own constituents but involves the interest and honor of this Government. I ask that the resolution be read, and I trust that its character will at once secure for it the consideration its importance demands, and that it be at once adopted.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not inconsistent with the public interest, to communicate to this House any information he may have received relative to the detention of the steamer Black Warrior, the seizure of her cargo, or the imprisonment of her officers. Also, any information in reference to any other violation of our rights by the Spanish authorities.

Mr. HAVEN. I hope that resolution will be allowed to pass.

No objection being made to its introduction, the question was taken upon its adoption, and decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was agreed to.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois, asked and obtained leave, and introduced joint resolutions of the Legislature of Illinois, instructing the Senators, and requesting the Representatives from that State, to procure the passage of a bill extending to the surviving officers and soldiers of the war of 1812 the same pensions which have been granted to others who have served their country in other wars.

The resolutions were read, and ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE ON COHASSET ROCKS.

Mr. FULLER. Before we proceed to the regular order of business, I ask the indulgence of the House to allow me to introduce, from the Committee on Commerce, a joint resolution, and to have it considered at this time, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to act upon a very important matter. It requires immediate action. I have the letter of the Secretary in my hand, which I will read, if any gentleman doubts the propriety of the resolution.

The joint resolution was then read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Light-House Board to determine upon the site, plan, and mode of constructing the light-house upon Cohasset rocks, and for other purposes.

Mr. FULLER. The resolution has been considered very carefully by the committee, and I ask that the letter of the Secretary may be read.

A MEMBER. No need of that.

The resolution was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask leave to introduce a memorial from the Smithsonian Institution, with a view of having it referred to the special committee appointed early in January. It is a memorial asking Congress to authorize the Treasury Department to receive $150,000, saved from the accrued interest, on the same terms as those on which the original bequest was received.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. BISSELL. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a report from the Committee of Conference on the bill relating to the compensation of the San Francisco sufferers.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered to be put upon the bill under consideration yesterday, it will require the consent of the House to allow the gentleman from Illinois to make his report.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the gentleman from Illinois has the floor to make his report.

The report of the Committee of Conference was then read, as follows:

The Committee of Conference upon the two disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill for the relief of United States troops who were sufferers by the recent disaster to the steamship San Francisco met, and, after a full and free consultation, agree to recommend that the Senate recede from their second amendment, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to this bill, (H. R. No. 135,) and that the bill be further amended in section one, line nine, by striking out the word "four," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "eight."

JAS. SHIELDS,
JAMES C. JONES,
R. W. JOHNSON,

Committee on the part of the Senate.

W. H. BISSELL,
J. R. CHANDLER,

Committee on the part of the House of Representatives.

The question was then put; and the report of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Alabama. I ask the unanimous consent to present resolutions from the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, with a view to have them referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The resolutions set forth that there are large tracts of fine lands in the State of Alabama remaining unsold, which are now considered poor, and which at present bring in but little revenue to the General Government; and if the price of those were materially reduced, that the revenue arising from the sale of the same to the Government and to the State would be greatly increased. Congress is invoked to give the subject its earliest attention, and materially reduce the price of the same.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the resolutions will be received, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

MINNESOTA RAILROAD BILL.

The SPEAKER. There is a question already pending under the operation of the previous question, which is on laying the following bill upon the table:

An act to aid the Territory of Minnesota in constructing a railroad in said Territory for military, postal, and for other purposes.

Mr. DEAN. As I made the motion to lay the bill upon the table, and asked the yeas and nays, I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and will also, with the consent of the House, withdraw the motion to lay the bill upon the table; but I shall renew it at the proper time.

Mr. AIKEN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw the memorial and papers of Susannah Wayne Pinckney from the files of the House, for the purpose of presenting them to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. MILLSON. I want to test the bill in its present consideration, therefore I move to lay the bill and amendments on the table; and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether this is the regular order of business, and whether it must necessarily take precedence of all other business?

The SPEAKER. It is the regular order of business, and the main question having been ordered to be now put, no other business is in order until it is disposed of.

The question was then put; and decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 107; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Thomas H. Bayly, Belcher, Bennett, Bocoock, Boyce, Carpenter, Caskie, Chastain, Christian, Colquhoun, Craig, Dean, Dent, Drum, Ewing, Faulkner, Fuller, Gamble, Giddings, Goode, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron, Harlan, Sampson, W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Hibbard, Hiestler, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kittredge, Kurtz, Lane, Letcher, Lilly, McCulloch, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Maurice, Millson, Morrison, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, Powell, Pratt, Preston, Puryear, Seward, Seymour, Shaw, Showler, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Snodgrass, Stratton, Straub, Andrew Stuart, Vail, Vansant, Wade, and Hendrick B. Wright—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, James C. Allen, Barksdale, Benson, Bissell, Breckinridge, Bugg, Campbell, Canby, Chambers, Chandler, Chase, Clark, Clingan, Cobb, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Cullom, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, De Witt, Dick, Dickinson, Disney, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Edmonds, Ellison, English, Foley, Franklin, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Harrison, Henn, Hill, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, Roland Jones, Kerr, Knox, Lamb, Lindsey, Macdonald, McDougal, Macne, Macy, Matson, Maxwell, Middlenburgh, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morgan, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Pennington, Phelps, Phillips, Pringle, Ready, Reese, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchie, Robbins, Rogers, Russell, Sage, Sapp, Shannon, Simmons, Singleton, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick F. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Upham, Walbridge, Walley, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, and Zollicoffer—107.

So the House refused to lay the bill and amendments upon the table.

Pending the call of the roll—

Mr. DOWDELL (who was not within the bar when his name was called) asked the unanimous consent of the House to vote.

Mr. REESE objected.

The SPEAKER. On yesterday, the motion was submitted to reconsider the vote by which the fourth amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was adopted, and a further motion was made to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. The question now pending before the House is upon this latter motion, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. LILLY. I ask that the amendment may be reported to the House before we are called to vote upon it.

The amendment was read by the Clerk, and is as follows:

"Insert at the end of the third section, the following: 'Provided, however, That the money arising from the sales of the reserved sections shall be paid over to those States which have received no grant of the public lands for internal improvements, according to their representation in Congress.'"

The question was put; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 95, nays 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Ashe, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Boyce, Bridges, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskey, Chandler, Chastain, Chrisman, Colquitt, Cox, Craige, Crocker, Thomas Davis, Dent, Dick, Dickinson, Edmunds, Edmundson, Etheridge, Everhart, Ewing, Farley, Faulkner, Franklin, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Goodrich, Grey, Aaron Harlan, Haven, Hibbard, Hiester, Hill, Howe, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kerr, Kittredge, Kurtz, Letcher, Lilly, McCulloch, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Matteson, Maurice, May, Meacham, Middlesworth, Millson, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, Pratt, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, Reese, Riddle, David Ritchie, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Seward, Shaw, Shower, Simmons, Skelton, William Smith, Snodgrass, Stratton, Straub, Thurston, Tracy, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walley, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, and Zollicoffer—95.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Banks, Barksdale, Benton, Bissell, Bocoek, Breckinridge, Campbell, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Cook, Corwin, John G. Davis, Dawson, Deau, De Witt, Disney, Dowdell, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerston, Ellison, English, Gamble, Green, Greenwood, Grow, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Hendricks, Henn, Hughes, Hunt, Ingersoll, Johnson, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Knox, Lamb, Maxwell, Lindsey, Macdonald, McDougall, Macy, McNeill, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Pennington, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Sapp, Seymour, Shannon, Singleton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Walbridge, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Wells, John Wentworth, Westbrook, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Yates—90.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

After the roll had been called, and before the result was announced—

Mr. HARLAN, of Indiana, who was without the bar when his name was called, asked the unanimous consent of the House to have his name recorded.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. HARLAN then stated that had he been within the bar he should have voted "No."

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, who was also without the bar, stated that he should have voted "No."

Mr. DEAN. I now move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from New York will not press that motion, but will allow the vote to be taken on the passage of the bill. Let its friends take care of it now. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw his motion to lay the bill upon the table. [Cries of "No!" "No!" and "Order!"]

Mr. DEAN. I cannot withdraw it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. I rise to a question of order. As I understood the proceedings of the House this morning, a vote was taken on the motion to lay this bill upon the table immediately before the last vote. The question of order that I raise is, whether that motion can be again made now?

The SPEAKER. As there has been action on the subject of the bill since that motion was voted on, the motion of the gentleman from New York is in order, according to the practice and the rules of the House.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain any motion until order is restored.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is the very point which I wish to make, that order be enforced.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion to lay the bill on the table, on which motion the yeas and nays are ordered.

The roll was called, and the question was decided in the affirmative, there being—yeas 126, nays 66, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Thomas H. Bayly, Barksdale, Belcher, Bennett, Benton, Bissell, Bocoek, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bridges, Campbell, Carpenter, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Craige, John G. Davis, Dawson, Deau, Dent, Disney, Dowdell, Drum, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerston, Edmundson, Elliot, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Ewing, Faulkner, Fuller, Gamble, Giddings, Goode, Green, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hiester, Hughes, Ingersoll, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kittredge, Knox, Kurtz, Lamb, Lane, Letcher, Lilly, Lindsey, McDougall, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Maurice, Maxwell, May, Smith Miller, Millson, Morrison, Murray, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Peckham, John Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Pratt, Preston, Puryear, Thomas Ritchey, Sapp, Seward, Seymour, Shannon, Shaw, Shower, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stratton, Straub, Andrew Stuart, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Westbrook, Wright, and Yates—120.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Appleton, Ball, Benson, Bugg, Caruthers, Chandler, Chase, Clingman, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Cullom, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Dick, Dickinson, Edmunds, Everhart, Farley, Franklin, Goodrich, Greenwood, Grey, Harrison, Hill, Howe, Hunt, Kerr, Lindsey, McCulloch, Matteson, Meacham, Middlesworth, John G. Miller, Morgan, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Pringle, Ready, Reese, Riddle, David Ritchie, Robbins, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Simmons, William R. Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Upham, Walbridge, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburne, Wells, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, and Zollicoffer—66.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois, when his name was called on the above vote, said: When a bill is upon the table, it is dead. While it is off the table, it is alive; and while there is life there is hope; and this is my reason for voting "no" now.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will state his privileged question.

Mr. LANE. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was taken; and the latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will state his privileged question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Committee of the Whole has reported two or three little bills, and if there is no provision in them to appropriate part of the money to the old States I trust the House will pass them. One of these bills is for the construction of a road in New Mexico—not a railroad, but a common wagon road. I ask that that bill be now taken up and considered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SKELTON. I ask for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is, first, the consideration of certain Senate bills.

The following Senate bills were then read a first and second time by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

An act to incorporate the proprietors of the Glenwood Cemetery—to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

An act for the relief of Conrad Wheat, jr., or his legal representatives—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Samuel Prioleau, deceased—to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

An act authorizing a patent to be issued to Peter Ponsin, for certain lands therein described—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

An act for the relief of Zadoc C. Ingram—to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BAYLY. I move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SOLLERS. I ask for tellers upon that motion.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. BAYLY, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. As it appears evident that we shall not go into committee to-day, I think if the gentleman [Mr. EDGERTON] will permit the few bills in reference to Territories which have come from the Committee of the Whole to the House to be disposed of, we could then adjourn.

But if that is not done, I move that the House do adjourn now.

Mr. EDGERTON. I would state to the House, that during this whole session, but one solitary day has been devoted to the consideration of private claims. But one single day on which they could be discussed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask one question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do so by leave of the House.

Mr. JONES. I would say Saturdays are private bill days; and they have been considered on those days.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. JONES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and the motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole upon the Private Calendar, it was put, and decided in the affirmative.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House upon the Private Calendar, (Mr. CAMPBELL in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The bill first in order for consideration is No. 51, being a bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe.

The bill provides that the sum of $3,016, adjudged to be due and owing to the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe from the Sac and Fox tribe of Indians, by the Hon. Henry Dodge, when Governor of Wisconsin Territory, shall be deducted from the first annuities that may become due to the said tribe of Indians.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. I call for the reading of the report in the case.

Mr. ORR. The report in this case embraces seventeen pages; and I think I can so state the question so that the House can understand it in a much shorter time than by the reading of the report.

This is an application, Mr. Chairman, by the legal representatives of Elijah Beebe, for indemnity for depredations committed upon his property by the Sac and Fox tribe of Indians, in the year 1821, west of the Mississippi river, in what is now called the State of Iowa. The questions for the committee to determine in this case are, first, as to the destruction of the property; and second, as to the liability of the Government to pay for this property. The Committee on Indian Affairs, who examined the matter, were satisfied that the case was made out. One of the witnesses, who was with him at the time, testified to it. He was driving a stock of cattle and hogs to a fort upon the Upper Mississippi—Fort Snelling, I believe—from Charaton, frontier point in the State of Missouri, for the purpose of supplying that fort. While Mr. Beebe and his men were on the way, the Sacs and Foxes came upon them, and drove off their stock, of upwards of twenty head of cattle, which they succeeded in reclaiming. The next day the Indians again assailed them, drove off some twenty-eight head, and destroyed them. They also drove off, and they were lost to those parties, some four hundred and fifty head of hogs. A witness, whose credibility is certified to by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, in the report which I hold in my hand, testifies that he was with Beebe when the property was destroyed. The objection which has been started to the bill, and the only report, so far as I know, is in the question whether this Government is liable in a case of this sort where property belonging to citizens of the United States was destroyed by the Indians? Now, by the act of Congress passed 1802, regulating intercourse with the Indians, it is provided that if any Indians belonging to any tribe in amity shall steal, take, or destroy any property belonging to any citizens of the United States, the party, on making complaint to the Indian agent, shall be reimbursed from the next annuity paid to the Indians so taking or destroying his property, in case annuities are due to such Indians. But if the Indians receive no annuities, then the act gives a full guarantee that the parties suffering shall be fully reimbursed out of the Treasury.

Now, sir, at the time when these depredations were committed the Sacs and Foxes received no annuities. They were committed in 1821. Beebe died in the latter part of 1822. But it seems from the memorandum which has been found in the book of the Indian agent at St. Louis that Beebe made known this claim to the agent; and upon the third page of the report in this case will be found the following certificate to that effect. I will read it to the committee:

SUPERINTENDENCY OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, }
St. Louis, June 27, 1837.

This will certify, that it appears from the records of this office that a claim of E. Beebe against the Sacs and Foxes was filed in it for the following:

1822.—For 22 head of cattle, at $28.....	$616
For 150 head breeding sows, at $8.....	1,200
For 300 head young sows, at $4.....	1,200

GEORGE MAGUIRE,
Clerk Office Superintendent Indian Affairs.

As I remarked, Beebe died soon after these depredations were committed. The affidavit of Mr. Wells, the witness more materially relied upon than any other, was filed on the 10th of January, 1823, showing that the provisions of the "intercourse act" were being carried out when Beebe died; but in consequence of the inability of any one to prosecute the claim for him, the case was permitted to slumber from that time till 1836, when it was again brought to the attention of the Indian agent at St. Louis. The Sacs and Foxes at that time refused to make compensation for the losses which had been sustained, upon the ground, as they alleged, that it was not their tribe, but some other, which committed the depredations—an excuse which Indians always make under similar circumstances.

In 1837, General Dodge, of Wisconsin, at present one of the Senators from that State, was directed to ascertain certain accounts due by these Sacs and Fox Indians which were to be paid out of the annuities paid those Indians under a treaty for certain lands which they had ceded to the United States. Pursuant to this authority, General Dodge at the time made this certificate:

I certify that, in conformity with the amendment made by the Senate of the United States to the second article of the treaty with the Sacs and Foxes, of September 28, 1836, and in accordance with the instructions of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, of March 22, 1837, an investigation of the claim of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe, late of St. Louis, deceased, was had, and the amount of $5,770 40 (principal and interest) was adjudged to be justly due and owing to the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe, late of St. Louis, deceased, from the confederated tribes of Sacs and Fox Indians.

HENRY DODGE,
Superintendent of Indian Affairs.

When this certificate or ascertainment of General Dodge was filed at the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, it was objected to by the Commissioner, on the ground that General Dodge had no right, in the capacity in which he went to this territory, to ascertain spoiliations that had been committed, but that he was simply to ascertain accounts due; and the claim was rejected by the Commissioner upon various grounds, the principal of which was, the length of time which had elapsed since the alleged spoliation was committed. Now, I think that is not a sufficient ground upon which to reject the claim. These parties made application, as the law directs, within eighteen months or less, after the spoliation was committed. Beebe died, leaving a wife and children. There was nobody to look after his interests, and the matter continued in that condition until his children grew up, some fifteen or sixteen years afterwards, when they renewed the application to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, in 1837. It is the laches of the Government itself which has occasioned the delay. They filed their application; they made the proof; and they were entitled to the money. Justice would seem to require that they should be paid interest; but the Committee on Indian Affairs, pursuant to the usual practice of the House, have not recommended the payment of interest, although General Dodge recommended that it should be paid.

This, Mr. Chairman, is, I believe, a succinct statement of the facts of the case. I have tried to be as brief as possible, and it may be, that in my efforts at brevity, I have not been quite as clear in my statement as I ought to have been. I think the claim is a just one, and that it ought to be paid to this widow and these orphans.

Mr. SOLLERS. I desire to say a few words upon this subject. I certainly have no particular or personal objection to the claim now under consideration. But there has been, from the foundation of the Government of the United States up to the present time, a distinction drawn between particular classes of claims, which I think very unjust.

Sir, I represent upon this floor men who have lost an immense amount of property in the war of 1812; and yet, although that property was appropriated to the use of the Government of the United States by the orders of their commanding officers; although troops were quartered on these men, and their houses and barns were made depôts for military munitions, there has not been a single claim for compensation before this Congress that has been passed upon favorably. All have been rejected. Now, if a man in the South or West loses a mule, or a cow, or a horse, he comes to this Government and claims compensation for it, and he gets it. Why is this? why this unjust distinction? Why should these people come here and claim compensation for one hundred and fifty "breeding sows," when we have lost our farms and the houses that protected us and our wives and children from the winds and waters of heaven, and lost them at the command of the officers of the Government of the United States? I repeat, that I have no objection to this claim.

I differ in toto, Mr. Chairman, from Mr. Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina, who voted always in the negative. I, on the contrary, generally, if not always, vote in the affirmative. I prefer to vote in the affirmative; but gentlemen undertake to tell me that these are claims which should not be allowed. There have been claims pressed upon you, time after time, sent in to you with the indorsement of the Senate of the United States. These should have been passed. In three or four of these I am interested on account of my constituents. These claims have been received here from the Senate, and referred to the Committee of Claims. And what has been the result? They have either refused to pass them, or have not acted upon them at all. These claims are for property destroyed by the British in 1812 and '13—when the army under the command of William Brown, a captain of the English Navy—came up the Chesapeake and invaded and destroyed your Capitol. All along the line by which they passed these miscreants committed every kind of depredation and outrage. They seized upon our property, and burned our houses. One of the houses—for which compensation is claimed—was occupied by the commanding officer of the American Army, and yet Congress refuses to grant one single cent of indemnity. And yet if thousands of dollars of compensation are claimed on other grounds, the Congress of the United States is perfectly willing to grant it. And notwithstanding, as in one of these cases, the claimant's house was made the depôt of munitions of war, you refuse to pay him, and refuse it from the great generosity of your heart. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen of the committee, I will appeal to you to be just. Do act honestly in regard to all proper claims against the Government. The people of the United States expect us to act honestly and justly, and pray let us do so. I do assure you that they appreciate the virtues of honesty and justice. For my constituents, at least, I can say that a more honest and just set of people never existed in the world. [Laughter.] But from the action of the Government it would seem as if they did not care whether they were honest or not. For my part, I will vote for this claim now before the committee with great pleasure; but if I do vote for it, I hope the committee will also vote for the claims in which some of my constituents are interested, which are equally just and meritorious. Will you not vote indemnity for the houses which were destroyed over the heads of their wives and children; for the loss which they sustained in consequence of Government officers converting their houses into depôts for muskets and cannon, from which they fired at Brown's army?

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of Mr. MACHEN, its Chief Clerk, stating that the Senate had passed sundry bills, (all which were private bills,) in which it asked the concurrence of the House.]

Mr. SOLLERS, (resuming.) I was about to remark, Mr. Chairman, that if you refuse this compensation, you do a gross piece of injustice. It is unjust that the Government of the United States should pay some particular claimants and refuse to pay others equally meritorious. And why is it so? Do you imagine the country is unobservant of such inconsistent action? Beware! We have a very shrewd set of people to represent—a people who could, if they deemed it right, bring more influence to bear here by the employment of lobby members—a very important element in the Government of the United States, it seems to me—a people who could employ an army of agents for the purpose of conducting their claims, and pay them, too—and I take it for granted the agents demand pay in advance; for they would stand little chance, if dependent upon the favorable action of Congress upon the claims—and it seems that the men who employ the most agents and influence have the greater certainty of the passage of their claims. What is the cause of this system of claim agency? It is your neglect of action. For years and years there have been just claimants before the Congress of the United States; but they have gone away with hopes deferred, and it may be, with hearts sick—men who have as just claims upon the Government of the United States as ever a claimant had against a defendant; and yet you turn your backs upon them, and tell them you have not time to attend to their matters.

In the particular part of the country which I represent, I know cases of hardship I could present to the mind of honorable gentlemen which, could they set aside their political feelings and forego their ambitious desires, would bring tears in their eyes. There are widows, too, among the claimants of which I speak—for there were patriots in those days among the women—who had their houses burned over their heads, and they have made application, year after year, to the Government of the United States, for damages, and not a single cent can they get. But let a new case arise, and there is no difficulty. Such cases are not laid aside because they are ancient, not a bit of that, though that is the excuse of some gentleman for not attending to some cases. They interpose the statute of limitation, even in many just cases. An admirable set of lawyers!

But what is government instituted for, if not for the purpose of doing justice to every human being upon the face of God's earth? What is the object of all human government, if not to establish equity and secure justice to all parties, high and low? That is the object of all good government. I say, in conclusion, that I have no objection to this claim. I vote in the affirmative for all these things, where there is a shadow of justice to sustain them. Let any man present to the Government of the United States anything like a plausible claim, and I will go for it. I do not mean to examine the questions critically. [Laughter.] I vote for anything which any man presents to the Congress of the United States against the Government, if it is fair.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, (interrupting.) Would the gentleman go for these claims indiscriminately, without reference to the number of claim agents pressing them?

Mr. SOLLERS. Surely that is a question am not called upon to answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANE. I understand the gentleman from Maryland to state—I may have misunderstood him—that claimants were successful in proportion to the number of claim agents employed. My understanding of the feeling of this House is, that they are universally prejudiced against claim agents; and so far has that prejudice extended, that an effort has been made here, and successfully, to exclude them from the Halls of the House, without reference to the number employed.

Mr. SOLLERS. The gentleman from Indiana has interrupted me by making a point upon me as a means of getting his name in print in connection with my own. [Laughter.] I shall vote for this bill for the sake of saving the credit of the Government. I take it for granted that no man presents a claim upon the Government of the United States unless it has some validity in it. That frauds have been committed, I readily acknowledge, but my own impression is that they have not been committed in the presentation, but in the exaggeration of such claims. Were I a member of the Committee of Claims, I would do what I considered was right and proper. In my own judgment and experience, I believe that no man has ever presented against the Government of the United States claims which had not in themselves some validity, some justice, and some equity; and for that reason I go for them all. [Laughter.]

would assume the privilege of controlling my constituents, and not be controlled by them. I would mould public opinion, that public opinion might not mould me. I am not one of those who hang upon, or wait for the expression of public opinion, in order that their acts might be controlled by it. I, as a Representative of an honest and intelligent constituency, will do what I believe to be right; and if my constituents do not choose to indorse my action, they doubtless will let it alone.

Let me give a lesson of wisdom to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. LANE.] He had better undertake to control the sentiments of his constituents, than to be controlled by them; and he will find that out after a little while. It is true, that a man may be successful now and then by falling in with what is considered the public opinion of his constituents; but in Maryland, he who endeavors to elevate popular sentiment is the man who, after all, is the most successful.

In conclusion, let me say, that I shall vote for all appropriations to satisfy private claims, if they have the slightest semblance of justice, because the vigilance of the members of this House on the committees will detect those which are not valid.

Mr. LETCHER. I listened, Mr. Chairman, with the closest attention to the remarks submitted by my friend over the way, [Mr. ORR,] in presenting this bill for the consideration of the committee, and I cannot agree with him at all, either in his statement of the merits of the bill, or in the conclusions at which he has arrived in regard to its justice. This is a claim which is alleged to have originated in the year 1821, for the loss of various hogs and twenty-two head of cattle.

The claim is predicated upon a provision in the intercourse act of 1802, to which I desire now to call the attention of the committee, and then I shall endeavor to show that the claim does not come within the provisions of that law. I will read the provision I have alluded to:

"It is provided by the 14th section of what is called the 'intercourse act,' approved April 2, 1802, 'that if any Indian or Indians, belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States, shall come over or cross the said boundary line into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States, and there take, steal, or destroy any horse, horses, or other property belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or either of the territorial districts of the United States, or shall commit any murder, violence, or outrage upon any such citizen or inhabitant, it shall be the duty of such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent, to make application to the superintendent, or such other person as the President of the United States shall authorize for that purpose, who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction or instruction of the President of the United States, make application to the nation or tribe to which such Indian or Indians shall belong, for satisfaction; and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction in a reasonable time, not exceeding twelve months, then it shall be the duty of the superintendent, or other person authorized as aforesaid, to make return of his doings to the President of the United States, and forward to him all the documents and proofs in the case, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper to obtain satisfaction for the injury; and in the mean time, in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guaranty to the party injured an eventual indemnification.'"

Now, sir, this claim originated in 1821, as is alleged by the claimants. It is also stated that in 1822 the claimant applied for relief, by filing his claim before the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, giving a list of these hogs and cattle, with the prices, and furnishing him with the evidence, proving his loss satisfactory upon all these points. This is what the claimants allege, as I understand from the report.

Now, sir, I shall endeavor to show from this report, and from the evidence of Mr. Wells, the witness most relied upon to support this claim, that there was no documentary proof, nor evidence of any sort whatever, presented to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs at the time the memorandum of this claim was filed at the office of the St. Louis agency, showing that any loss had been sustained; nor is there any documentary or other evidence, in respect to these Indians, by which we can ascertain to how great an extent they were guilty of wrong in bringing about the loss of this property.

The witness relied upon is Solomon Wells, and the affidavit bears date 10th January, 1823. It purports to have been sworn to before Moses Scott. But there is no evidence that Moses Scott was a justice of the peace; there is nothing to show that he was authorized to administer oaths or to take affidavits until the 20th day of June, 1837, when John Ruland, clerk of the court for the county of St. Louis, certified as to his official character and qualifications.

Now, sir, I think the inference is entirely a fair one—and, I take it, it is the only inference which can be drawn—that this evidence could not have been filed in the office of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs before it was placed in a legal shape, so as to be made available in support of the claim. If filed, it could not have been filed before the 20th June, 1837. Then in 1821 this loss is represented to have accrued. But not until the 20th day of June, 1837, is the deposition of Solomon Wells perfected and placed in legal shape by being certified to by the clerk of the court for the county of St. Louis, a period of nearly sixteen years.

But, sir, this view is confirmed by looking at the date of the testimony of the other witnesses relied upon in this case. Another witness relied upon is D. G. Bates, whose statement bears date on the 24th day of September, in the year 1836, within some eight or nine months of the date of the other statement. Then, again, the deposition of a man of the name of J. W. Shull, living in the State of Illinois, is introduced, and that bears date July 1, 1837. Now, is it not very clear, from the dates of these depositions, that the necessary steps required by the provision of the intercourse law, which is referred to authorizing the allowance of this claim, were not taken, and that the claim was not prosecuted in such a way as to furnish evidence of the liability on the part of these Indians for this amount, which would authorize it to be deducted from the allowance to be paid over to them by the Government of the United States.

Then there is accumulated evidence on this subject in the report, which evidence shows when this claim was first brought to the attention of the Sac and Fox Indians. I read from the report:

ROCK ISLAND, September 28, 1836.
I certify that I laid the within claim before the Sac and Fox Indians at the treaty at Rock Island, September, 1836, and after it was read to them by the interpreter of the Government, they denied any knowledge of the claim, and refused to pay it.
JOSEPH M. STREET,
United States Indian Agent.

Now, so far as we can judge from the papers exhibited here by the applicants themselves in behalf of this claim, the necessary steps in order to establish the liability on the part of these Indians were not taken until an interval of fifteen years had elapsed between the occurrence for which they claim compensation and the application to the Indians to fix the liability upon them.

Mr. ORR. Read the next letter.

Mr. LETCHER. Here it is:

GALENA, August 11, 1838.
DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find the documents of the claim of the widow and heirs of the late Elijah Beebe, deceased, against the Sac and Fox Indians, for depredations committed by them, and which has been so often presented in some shape or other since the year 1823; —Was it presented in 1823, when the proofs relied upon to sustain it, bear date in 1836 and 1837? and which was allowed by Governor Dodge, as you will see by the certificate inclosed. It is directed by the War Department that the claim be proceeded with according to the intercourse act of 1802, section 14.

That is the section of the intercourse act to which I have called the attention of the committee: I beg that you will, therefore, at the next annuity payment to the said Indians, present the claim to them for payment, and make return of the proceedings as the regulation requires.

Will you have the goodness, likewise, to inform me what shall be done in relation thereto; and in case of refusal to pay, to forward the documents of your report to the War Department immediately, in order that no further delay may take place.

I am, respectfully, yours, &c.,
CHAS. S. HEMPSTEAD,
Att'y for Beebe's rep's.
General JOSEPH M. STREET,
Agent for the Sac and Fox Indians.

P. S. Please observe that the above claim was originally presented under, and is to be governed by, the intercourse act of 1802, and not under subsequent acts.

Now, here follows the report of the Indian agent, Mr. Street, upon the second application made to the Sac and Fox Indians in 1838:

SAC AND FOX AGENCY, September 8, 1838.
The accompanying claim of Elijah Beebe was presented to the Sac and Fox Indians, at the time of the payment of their annuities for the year 1838, and explained to them. They replied, in substance, that the same claim had before been presented to them, and they had refused to pay it, because the depredations were committed by other Indians than the Sacs and Foxes. They now repeated their refusal to pay, after a full explanation of the nature and amount of their claim.
JOS. M. STREET,
United States Indian Agent.

Then, sir, I take it that the evidence in regard to this case, if it established anything, established clearly and incontestably the fact that the first steps which were taken to bring this case to the attention of the Sac and Fox Indians, were taken at their council in the year 1836. Now, sir, I submit that this committee—where there has been this intermission of fifteen years, in which there has been no attempt to couple these parties as the guilty parties with this loss, and where there has been no proof to show that they are the guilty parties, filed in due time and according to the provisions of the law—I submit, I say, that it would be improper for us now to undertake to say that by the law we should deduct from the annuities which we are now paying to these tribes of Indians the amount of compensation claimed by the heirs of Beebe.

Let me, however, before I notice the second section of the bill, look at another fact connected with this matter. Mr. Wells, who is the chief witness relied upon, states that they set out from Chariton, on the Missouri, with these cattle and hogs, to go to the military posts on the Upper Mississippi.

Mr. ORR, (interrupting.) For the purpose of fulfilling a contract at Saint Peters.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well. They are going to fulfill a contract. Mr. Shull, whose testimony is also given here, states that he was informed by Mr. Beebe that they started "from St. Louis for Lord Selkirk's settlements on the Red river of the North." Mr. Wells states what he believes the number of cattle to have been, and what he believes to have been the number of hogs; and he states, also, the evidence of their loss by the Indians. He saw evidence that one hog had been killed—as well as I recollect his statement.

Well, sir, what has been done with this claim since? After it was refused to be paid by the Indians, in 1836, it was again brought forward in the year 1838, as stated, and the Indians having again failed to pay it, the claim was then laid before the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, [Mr. T. Hartley Crawford,] who examined it, and filed his decision on the 1st of January, 1839.

Mr. LETCHER read from the decision the following extracts:

"The first thing that strikes the mind is the length of time that has elapsed since this claim originated, without any steps, so far as we know, being taken between 1821 and 1836, that were required for its settlement. It is an alleged depredation, for which, if properly established and supported, provision is made by the fourteenth section of the intercourse law of 1802. That law requires that in such cases the party injured shall apply, by himself, attorney, agent, or representative, to the Indian superintendent or agent, who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall apply to the proper Indian nation or tribe for satisfaction; and if they refuse it for a reasonable time, not exceeding twelve months, the said superintendent or agent shall make return of his proceedings and the proofs to the President, that such further steps can be taken as may be proper to obtain satisfaction for the injury; and in the mean time the United States guarantee to the party an eventual indemnification. It appears that Joseph M. Street, Indian Agent, on the 28th September, 1836, at the treaty of Rock Island, laid the claim before the Indians, who, after it was read to them, denied any knowledge of it, and refused to pay it. It is probable the deposition of Wells alone was read to them at that time, as Mr. Street's certificate is on it, and that of Bates was taken but four days before, at some distance, but both may have been submitted. The claim was again presented, by the same agent, at the payment of the annuities for 1838, and explained, with all the proofs now before me, and again rejected, with the allegation that it was before presented, and that the depredations were committed by other Indians than the Sacs and Foxes. It was laid before the late commissioner for adjusting the debts of these Indians, under the treaty of 21st October, 1837, who correctly decided that it was not within the treaty provision under which he acted, and it is now presented at this office for allowance.

"What is the evidence? The only witness who testifies, and was with Mr. Beebe when this property is alleged to have been destroyed, is S. Wells. He says the Indians took twenty-eight head of cattle, which they afterwards abandoned and left with the whites. He then states that twenty-two head were lost, as he verily believes, and at least four hundred and fifty hogs; and that he saw evidence of the killing of one hog. It is manifest that this witness has no distinct knowledge of the loss: he states not a positive fact, but his belief, and talks of at least so many hogs, and the large number of four hundred and fifty. The affidavit of Mr. Shull details conversations with Mr. Beebe, and says, further, that the Indians admitted one band had dispersed a drove of cattle and hogs, belonging to a white man, and had killed some of them; and that another band offered beef hides for sale, saying they had killed the cattle on the waters of the Des Moines. To say nothing of the inconsistency involved in the admission of the Indians' charging one band, and the fact of offering hides for sale by another, the deposition establishes no one fact against these Indians. The testimony of Mr. Bates is still more lame; it is, with one or two exceptions, hearsay, but proves that one other drove, at least, besides Mr. Beebe's, traveled along the same track in the fall of 1831, and removes any impression Mr. Shall might make, by stating that Beebe's was the only drove that passed through the Indian country in that year; and he makes Mr. Beebe's loss one hundred and thirty-two head of cattle, instead of twenty-two, as Wells believes them to be. The loss itself is not established with any certainty; nor its amount; nor by whom committed. The Indian admissions detailed establish nothing. These conversations with detached parts of tribes may lead to acknowledgments by one individual, or many, against others. The only recognition of liability by the Indians, entitled to weight, is one made in council, when the chief of all the subdivisions of a nation or tribe are present, and cognizant of the doings of those over whom they rule. That is not only wanting here, but an express negation is twice given to it in council by the tribes."

Here is the chief testimony brought forward to support this claim. Here are the facts in regard to its origin and progress, up to the time of the presentation of this claim to the United States, and the facts subsequently in regard to the action of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in this city, after the examination of it in 1839. The result of that examination of the evidence is adverse to the claim itself, and for reasons which cannot fail to satisfy the members of this House, if they will examine it. I am satisfied, entirely satisfied, that the claim ought not to be allowed.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I expect to vote for this claim. I expect to vote for it because I believe it is just. I desire to say, for the benefit of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SOLLERS,] that since I have had the honor of a seat upon this floor, I have objected but to one single claim which has been reported to the House by any of its standing committees. That case was the bill reported by the gentleman from Illinois for the relief of General Wool. I objected to that, because I desired to examine the claim. I think that those who have watched my course here will bear me witness that I have shown as much liberality in sustaining claims brought by the committees before this House as any man upon this floor.

I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Maryland to a remark or two made by him—that I interrupted him for the purpose of gaining notoriety. I certainly had no such object in view. My object was, Mr. Chairman, to give the gentleman from Maryland an opportunity to correct his remarks. I called his attention to the remarks made by him, because I thought they imputed improper motives to members upon this floor.

The CHAIRMAN, (interrupting.) The Chair would remind the gentleman that he must, under the rules, confine his remarks to the subject under discussion.

Mr. LANE. I will do so, and in doing so answer the gentleman from Maryland. I repeat, I understood the gentleman from Maryland to say that a man who had a claim here, upon which claim agents were employed, was the most likely to succeed. I deny the correctness of the imputation. And I say here, that if the gentleman from Maryland, intended to charge that I had any object in view in interrupting him, in the way of gaining notoriety, it exists wholly in his own imagination, and that there is not the slightest foundation for it in truth. I had no such object.

Again, I understood the gentleman from Maryland to say that he moulded the opinions of his constituents.

Mr. SOLLERS. I did not say so.

The CHAIRMAN. I must again remind the gentleman from Indiana that he must confine his remarks to the discussion of the matter before the committee.

Mr. LANE. I am in favor of this bill, and expect to aid in pressing it through this committee. But I will take the liberty of responding to the remarks made by gentlemen upon this floor. Mould the opinions of his constituents! I suppose he means he can mould the opinions of that portion of his constituents, five of whom, under the provisions of the Constitution, can only count as three.

Mr. SOLLERS. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. LANE. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. SOLLERS. I said it was the duty of Representatives to endeavor to mould, but not to be the servant of public sentiment.

Mr. LANE. I submit to this committee whether I did not understand the gentleman rightly, as saying that he moulded the opinions of his constituents. I do not doubt that the gentleman from Maryland has the ability to mould the opinions of that portion of his constituency that requires five men to count as three. I am thankful that I represent no such constituency. I am here representing an independent constituency whose opinions cannot be moulded by any influences.

Mr. HUNT. I rise to inquire whether the gentleman from Indiana is in order in reflecting upon gentlemen representing a slaveholding constituency?

Mr. LANE. I say to the gentleman from Louisiana that I did not intend to reflect upon any gentleman upon this floor, and that I only desired to respond to the gentleman from Maryland. There is no gentleman present, I conceive, but what is here as constitutionally as I am, with the same rights upon this floor; but when a gentleman advances the doctrine that he moulds the opinion of his constituents, I have a right to investigate it, and to oppose my utter hostility to the sentiment.

Mr. SOLLERS. I have a right to say so. I did not say, however, that I moulded the opinions of my constituents.

Mr. LANE. The gentleman said, then, that he endeavored to mould the opinions of his constituency. I say that I represent a constituency that have opinions of their own. I came here to represent their opinions as their servant; and I do not envy any man who comes here to dictate to his constituents, or to mould, or endeavor to mould their opinions. I say to the gentleman from Maryland, that by the close of this session he will admit that I adhere as strictly and strongly to my own opinions as the gentleman himself, or any other gentleman upon this floor; and I not only will adhere to them, but I will press them upon this House with as much energy as any other member upon this floor. I think I have already shown this in my action here. I have as strong a conviction as any one, that it is the duty of Congress to get rid, as soon as possible, of these old claims that have been presented here year after year. Either reject them finally, and say that they can never come up again, or act upon them affirmatively at once. If the gentleman from Maryland will bring forward a just claim of the character to which he alluded, no one upon this floor will go further in support of it than I will. I acted with a minority, a very small minority, in advocating the passage of the bill placing soldiers of the war of 1812 upon the same footing as the soldiers in the Mexican war.

The gentleman from Maryland says that my object in interrupting him was to get my name into the newspapers. I would like to know how such a statement must seem to others, when he gets up and occupies the attention of the committee for half an hour against a proposition, and then closes by saying that he will support it.

Mr. SOLLERS. I did not say anything against it.

Mr. LANE. I understood the gentleman in the first part of the speech as speaking against the proposition, and that he closed his speech by saying that he would support this claim.

It seems to me that if any one has desired to get into the newspapers it was the gentleman from Maryland, and not myself. But I impute no such unworthy motives to him. That is all I have to say.

Mr. ORR obtained the floor.

Mr. SOLLERS. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina to yield me the floor for a moment.

Mr. ORR. I desire to arrest the personalities which are likely to grow out of this discussion between the gentlemen from Maryland and Indiana, and it was, in part, for that purpose that I took the floor.

Mr. SOLLERS. I have no wish to indulge in personality; but I appeal to the gentleman to yield me the floor for a moment, to allow me to set myself right.

Mr. ORR. If I thought good would grow out of it, I certainly should not decline. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SOLLERS. I did not say, nor did I intend to be understood as saying, that I could or would endeavor to mould the sentiments of my constituents. But, sir, I intended to rescue the character for independence of a member of this House from the imputation of being under the direct control of a portion of his constituents. Sir, this is the representative form of government, if I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must interrupt the gentleman from Maryland. The gentleman must confine himself to the discussion of the merits of the proposition under consideration.

Mr. SOLLERS. I am only answering an imputation made by the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can only pursue the train of remarks indicated by him, with the unanimous consent of the committee.

[Loud cries of "Go on!" "go on!"]

Mr. ORR. I desire to say that I think the gentleman from Indiana misunderstood the remark made by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SOLLERS. I was going on to say that this is a representative form of Government, and that a man who undertakes to represent any particular constituency upon this floor, ought, in some degree, to reflect the opinions of that constituency; but whatever may be the opinions of his constituency, he must be a miserable, pitiful specimen of humanity if he cannot be allowed to entertain and hold his own opinions. That is what I say. And I will remark further, that any man who is of sufficient importance to represent a congressional district in this House, ought to be of sufficient importance, if he is not, to mould, to some extent, the opinions of his constituents, in reference to matters connected with the administration of the Government, upon which he is called to act in Congress. I say this to the gentleman from Indiana, and I will not take it back.

Sir, I would not come to this House—I would not pretend to take a chair, or occupy a place in this House, if I was not of sufficient importance, if I had not sufficient intelligence—to mould, or give direction to the opinions of some people in my district, instead of being moulded by others. That is what I meant to say, and what I do say.

But the gentleman says, I want to get into the newspapers. Sir, from the commencement of the session up to the present time, have I shown any disposition to get into the newspapers? Have I made a motion, except in one single instance? I did, on one occasion, ask the consent of the House to offer a resolution directing an inquiry into the propriety of arresting the present unjust monopoly in the article of guano, which was objected to by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Dawson.] The subject was one of much importance to the whole farming and planting interests of the country; and the resolution should have been received and adopted.

Mr. DAWSON. So far from objecting to the resolution the gentleman desired to introduce, I yielded him the floor for that purpose; and I only took it again when I saw the matter was likely to give rise to debate.

Mr. SOLLERS. It was not likely to give rise to debate. There was not another man in the House who objected. But I repeat, this is the only favor I have asked of the House since I have occupied a seat upon this floor.

But the gentleman says I want to get into the newspapers. I do not want to get into the newspapers. And then he talks about my representing woolly-heads, if I did not misunderstand.

The CHAIRMAN. This discussion must be stopped, unless it is the unanimous consent of the committee that it shall go on.

Mr. SOLLERS. Well, sir, I had supposed that there was such an instrument known in this House, and recognized all over the world, as the Constitution of the United States, and that—

Mr. ORR. I rise to a question of order. I have none but the very kindest feelings towards my friend from Maryland; but I know there is no good likely to grow out of this, and I must therefore ask that the Chair will arrest this discussion before it proceeds any further.

Mr. LANE. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will allow the gentleman from Maryland to go on with what he has to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot permit it unless by unanimous consent.

[Cries of "Agreed!" and "Go on!"]

Mr. SOLLERS. If nobody objects, I suppose I can proceed with my remarks.

Mr. ORR. I say again to the gentleman from Maryland—I have not the pleasure of his personal acquaintance, but I have the greatest respect for him—that I would extend any courtesy to him, but I am sure that matters are taking a direction which will not result very pleasantly.

Mr. SOLLERS. Well, what matters that to the gentleman?

Mr. ORR. If I can prevent any gentleman upon this floor from getting into difficulties, I shall have accomplished a good work.

Mr. SOLLERS. Then just sit down, and let me go on.

Mr. ORR. Very well.

Mr. SOLLERS. If any imputation is to be cast on me because I represent what the gentleman from Indiana chooses to call "curly-heads"—

Mr. EDGERTON. I rise to a question of order. I insist that the discussion shall be confined to the bill now under consideration. This is private bill day, and must be devoted, under the rules, to the consideration of private bills. I therefore insist that the discussion shall proceed in order.

Mr. SOLLERS. I have a single word to say before the Chair decides the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and decides that the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland are out of order.

Mr. ORR. There has certainly been more spice introduced into the discussion of this little three thousand dollar claim than I had anticipated.

Mr. SOLLERS, (interrupting.) I desire to say one word, if the gentleman from South Carolina will allow me. I have been most grossly assailed. [Sensation.] My motives have been impugned. My object in supporting this bill has been impugned. I have been accused of inconsistency; and I really think that if this House has a particle of honor—and I take it for granted it has—it ought to allow me at least to make a speech in my own defense. I appeal to the House to do me this act of justice. I repeat, that I have been grossly charged—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Several MEMBERS. Appeal! Appeal!

Mr. SOLLERS. No, sir; I will not appeal; but it is the hardest case I ever heard of.

Mr. EDGERTON. I insist on my point of order. The gentleman from Maryland commenced this controversy himself; and if he is the victim, it is not the fault of the House.

Mr. ORR. I am very apprehensive that the committee is not in a very proper frame of mind to listen to an explanation about this little claim for $3,016, for that is the whole amount of it. We have already consumed an hour and a quarter upon it.

I will read to the committee a brief of the testimony of Wells:

"Mr. Wells, who was with Beebe at the time, testifies that they were met at the forks of the Des Moines river by a party of the Sac and Fox Indians, who commenced driving and scattering their cattle and hogs; that they followed the said Indians two days before overtaking them; and when they came up with them, they found twenty-eight head of cattle in their possession. Mr. Wells further states that, after recovering possession of these cattle from the said Indians, they were still harassed by them; and that they continued to harass and drive away their cattle and hogs until they had stolen and driven away twenty-two head of cattle and four hundred and fifty head of hogs. The deponent further states the value of the property destroyed by the said Indians, the time expended, and the trouble had in pursuing said Indians, and the actual damage of the interruption to Mr. Beebe."

Mr. SOLLERS. I rise to a question of order. Is the gentleman from South Carolina in order in addressing the committee? He has made one speech upon this bill already.

Mr. ORR. So has the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SOLLERS. Two wrongs never made a right. The gentleman is clearly out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland insist on his point of order?

Mr. SOLLERS. I do, sir, most emphatically.

Mr. ORR. I believe no other gentleman is claiming the floor who is entitled to it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true; there is no gentleman claiming it but the gentleman from Maryland, who has also addressed the committee on this bill.

Mr. SOLLERS. I do insist on my point of order.

Mr. ORR. The point is not well taken, unless there is some other gentleman claiming the floor who has a higher privilege than I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so decides.

Mr. SOLLERS. The gentleman has made one speech on this subject, and according to the rules, he has no right to make a second.

The CHAIRMAN. He has the right, unless some other gentleman wishes to address the committee who has not already done so.

Mr. HUNT. I will say a word or two. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] chose, in his remarks, to reflect upon gentlemen of this House who represent slaveholders here.

Mr. EDGERTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will state his question of order.

Mr. EDGERTON. My point of order is, that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT] is not confining his observations to the subject-matter before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana must confine himself to the merits of the bill now under consideration.

Mr. HUNT. I have a right, Mr. Chairman, not only to speak of the merits of the bill before the committee, but I submit that I have also a perfect right, when any false sentiment comes from the mouth of another gentleman on this floor, to correct that false sentiment, and to maintain the Constitution of my country as it was understood by its framers. Am I not in order, Mr. Chairman, in that position?

Mr. EDGERTON. I again rise to a question of order.

Mr. HUNT. Am I not in order, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Let the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EDGERTON] state his question of order.

Mr. EDGERTON. My question of order is this: That the gentleman from Louisiana is not discussing the question before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order that has been so raised.

Mr. SOLLERS. Will I be permitted to ask a single question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is out of order.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I appeal from the decision of the Chair ruling the gentleman from Louisiana out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky takes appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HUNT, (interrupting.) I was standing on the floor, Mr. Chairman, when I was called to order by the gentleman from Ohio. I have not given way. I stand upon my constitutional rights—on my rights as a member of this House—and I appeal respectfully to the committee from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it in order, Mr. Chairman, to move that the committee do now rise?

Mr. HUNT. I hope that motion will not be made, but that this matter will be permitted to be decided, as a matter of courtesy due to the South.

Mr. COBB. Oh, never mind the question of the South. We will have enough of that when the Nebraska bill comes up next week. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has raised a point of order, that the gentleman from Louisiana was not in order, inasmuch as he was not discussing the merits of the bill before the committee. The Chair has sustained the point raised, and from such decision the gentleman from Louisiana now takes an appeal. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of this committee?"

Mr. EDGERTON. I ask for the reading of the 35th rule.

Mr. HUNT. The gentleman from Ohio has no right to the floor now.

The 35th rule of the House was read by the Clerk, as follows:

"If any member in speaking or otherwise transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate. If there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise he shall not be permitted to proceed in case any member object, without leave of the House; and if the case require it he shall be liable to the censure of the House."

The question now being on the appeal—

Mr. KERR demanded tellers.

Mr. HUNT. If I am to be gagged and choked off from debate, I desire to say—

The CHAIRMAN, (interrupting.) The gentleman from Louisiana will suspend until the question is decided.

Several MEMBERS. Question! Question!

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS and SHANNON were appointed as such.

The question now being, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" it was put, and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 57; no quorum voting.

Mr. HUNT. I am now satisfied with this expression of the House. I consider the Constitution vindicated, and that this action is a rebuke of the gentleman who has used expressions in the way of disparagement of members upon this floor representing slaveholding territory.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. LANE. I will say to the gentleman from Louisiana, that if he intends to apply the term rebuked to me for any sentiment I have uttered, I laugh it to scorn! Yes, Mr. Chairman, to scorn! I have uttered no expression intended to disparage members upon this floor representing bond or free territory.

[Loud cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. McNAIR. I move that the committee rise.

The question was then taken, and upon division there were—ayes 72, noes not counted.

Mr. WHEELER demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. JONES, of Tennessee, and WHEELER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 47.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was referred the Private Calendar, had had under consideration House bill No. 51, being a bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

THE GARDINER CLAIM, ETC.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read for information.

It was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary heretofore charged with the duty of inquiring into the awards made by the commissioners sitting under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, to George A. Gardiner and John K. Mears, be instructed to extend that inquiry to every other award made by said commissioners, which may be supposed or alleged to have been founded in fraud, or supported by perjury or forgery; and that for this purpose they have power to send for persons and papers; and that they report the result of their investigations, with such recommendations as they deem to be proper, in the premises.

Mr. STANTON. I desire simply to say that I have been informed, from a respectable source, that testimony can be obtained, in reference to other claims awarded by the Commission appointed under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, showing that they were supported by frauds as gross as those connected with the claims our committee were the other day instructed to investigate. I desire to offer this resolution, therefore, in order to give us the power to make further investigations. Of course, I know nothing about them.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received, considered, and adopted.

Mr. SOLLERS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Thomas C. Lyles.

Mr. EDGERTON. For what purpose does the gentleman wish to withdraw the papers?

Mr. SOLLERS. I will tell the gentleman. It is for the purpose of obtaining additional testimony.

Mr. LETCHER. I have no objection, provided copies of the papers shall be retained in the Clerk's office.

Mr. SOLLERS. Of course I have no objection to that.

There being no objection, leave was accordingly granted.

CHEROKEE MONEYS.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to have read for information.

It was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House what amount of moneys have been appropriated, from time to time, for the benefit of the Cherokee Indians east of the Mississippi river, and for the Cherokee Indians west of the Mississippi river, and carried to the surplus fund from the year 1815, to January, 1854, stating under what treaty or law such appropriation was made, and when carried to the surplus fund.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received, considered, and agreed to.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a privileged question. I find that my vote upon the motion to adjourn over, yesterday, is incorrectly recorded upon the Journal. I am recorded in the affirmative. I voted against the motion. I ask that the Journal may be corrected, so as to accord with the fact.

There was no objection, and the correction was ordered to be made.

Mr. ORR offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That all debate in Committee of the Whole House, on the bill of the House (No. 51) "for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe," shall cease in five minutes after its consideration shall next be resumed in committee, (if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion thereon,) and the committee shall then proceed to vote upon such amendments as are pending or may be offered, and report the same to the House with such amendments as have been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. BRIDGES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and the motion agreed to, and—

At three o'clock the House adjourned until Monday, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 13, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Petition of ladies of Shelburne Falls, Massachusetts.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of citizens of Augusta, Maine, praying an immediate and unconditional repeal of the compromise acts of 1850; which was ordered to lie on the table.

CANAL AROUND NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. FISH. I desire to present two petitions of merchants of the city of New York, asking for an appropriation for the construction of a canal around Niagara Falls, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT. They will be so referred, if there be no objection.

Mr. FISH. Two similar petitions, which were heretofore presented, have been ordered to lie upon the table. I ask that they may be referred to the same committee.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, they will be taken from the table and so referred.

Mr. STUART. I would inquire whether these petitions are like the one which was reported back from the Committee on Public Lands asking a grant of public lands for the purpose?

Mr. FISH. Yes, sir.

Mr. STUART. Then I do not think it right that they should go the Committee on Commerce. It does not seem to me that that committee has anything to do with the question of granting public lands.

Mr. FISH. The petitions ask for a grant to aid in the construction of a work of internal improvements. The Committee on Commerce has invariably had subjects of that nature referred to them. Whether the grant is asked for in the shape of public lands or money for this purpose, it seems to me it is not necessary now to inquire, as the Committee on Commerce have invariably had subjects of internal improvements under their consideration. For that reason I think it the appropriate committee to which the memorials should be referred.

Mr. STUART. I do not know, sir, whether it may be important to settle this question now, but it seems to me that there is some importance in referring to the appropriate committees the subjects which belong to them. Now, sir, I cannot conceive any propriety in sending to the Committee on Commerce petitions which ask for a grant of public lands to aid in the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara, or any other work of internal improvement. It is conceded that the subject belongs to the Committee on Commerce if the appropriation asked for be that of money; but in the petitions which were sent to the Committee on Public Lands, the aid asked for was a grant of the public lands. I learned from the Senator from New York that this is the character of these petitions, and I do think that to send that subject to the Committee on Commerce is certainly in direct contravention of the rules of the Senate; and such being the case, I feel myself bound to make at least a protest against it. As far as I am concerned individually, it makes no difference as to my views, for I am on both those committees; but I think there is a practical importance in keeping these subjects before the committees to which they respectively belong.

In this instance the Committee on Public Lands determined that a grant of land ought not to be made, and therefore instructed me to report back the petitions, and ask to be discharged from their consideration. I did so, and the committee were discharged. Now it is sought to review the same question before another committee of the Senate, and before a committee to which the subject does not properly belong. I cannot agree with the Senator from New York that it is proper to send these petitions to the Committee on Commerce, because they may propose or recommend an appropriation of money for this object. Sir, I think it would be right to leave that committee to consider petitions and memorials which ask for a grant of money, but not those which ask for a grant of land. Such seems to me to be the proper view of the question.

Mr. FISH. Mr. President, it is true that these petitions ask for lands, but it by no means follows that Congress is to grant lands. Congress may grant the aid in such form as to it seems proper. The Committee on Public Lands have reported adversely to a grant of lands. The object sought is one of internal improvement, similar to those works which Congress has aided in various ways, sometimes by grants of land, and sometimes by grants of money. The Committee on Public Lands having decided that, in their judgment, aid in land is not appropriate, does not by any means preclude the whole question. The Senate may think differently from that committee, and the Committee on Commerce may very properly think that, although it would not be proper to grant lands, still a grant of money should be made. The object sought in these petitions is an important one, and surely it should not be precluded an opportunity of being presented to the Senate on a mere technical question. Because an inappropriate committee has reported adversely, it is no reason that the committee to which the subject legitimately pertains should not have an opportunity of passing upon it, and recommending a money appropriation, if they think proper. I hope the Senate will allow the reference which I have proposed. The subject is already before the Committee on Commerce; and I only propose to send to that committee further petitions on a subject which they are now considering.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, this subject was brought before the Senate at the last session. A number of memorials were presented to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce, but it was too late in that session for the committee to take them up, and the subject, therefore, fell through. Early in this session a large number of memorials—I do not know how many, I should think a hundred—were presented here, and all of them, with only two or three exceptions that I know of, were referred to the Committee on Commerce. This being so, the subject is under the consideration of that committee. Representing, as I do, constituents who are deeply interested in the subject, and being a member of that committee, I desire that no conclusion may be drawn adverse to the consideration of the subject by the Committee on Commerce, who have it in charge. I hope, therefore, that these petitions will go to that committee.

The question is, what is the principle, and what is the incident? The principle is the construction of the canal around the Falls of Niagara for the benefit of commerce. The incident is the means or funds which shall be used for that purpose. This is a fair subject for the action of the Committee on Commerce; and, for one, as a member of that committee, I desire that we may be allowed to prosecute our inquiry in regard to it, and bring the subject before the Senate.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, if I did not think there was more importance in this question than the mere reference of these memorials, I certainly should not have said a word upon the subject. Now, sir, let us look at this question practically. Any Senator may introduce a resolution and have it referred to the Committee on Commerce, asking them to consider the propriety of making a grant to construct a canal around the Falls of Niagara. That can be done on any morning, and that would bring the subject legitimately and properly before that committee. It is one over which they have cognizance by the rules of the Senate; but the question presented here is, whether you will refer to the Committee on Commerce a subject over which they have no jurisdiction whatever by the rules of the Senate? If the Senate will do it in this instance, they will do it in any other, and the consequences can be conceived at a glance by any Senator present.

I think there is a manifest importance in confining the business of the Senate to the committees respectively to which that business belongs, keeping each committee strictly within its own sphere, and not permitting any conflict of jurisdiction at all. It is for that reason that I made the suggestion which I did in the outset; and I wish to take the sense of the Senate on that question, and that alone. I do not wish to embarrass this proposition in any way; for I trust no man would be more gratified to see a canal constructed around the Falls of Niagara than I would. That question is not involved now, but the simple question is, whether you will keep the business of the Senate before the committees to which it properly belongs; and for the purpose of testing that question, I move that these petitions lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York has moved that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STUART. I move that they lie on the table.

Mr. FISH. The petitions which I presented this morning, I understand, have already been referred to the Committee on Commerce. I then moved to take up two petitions on the same subject, which had heretofore been ordered to lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York is right.

Mr. STUART. I do not know how, then, the matter is to be reached; but it was stated, as I understood, that those petitions would be referred to that committee unless there was objection. I rose and made objection.

The PRESIDENT. Perhaps the Senator from Michigan is right. The chair will put the motion to lay the petitions on the table.

Mr. STUART called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Bayard, Brown, Butler, Clay, Dodge of Iowa, Evans, Geyer, Houston, Johnson, Pratt, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, and Walker—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Brodhead, Chase, Everett, Fessenden, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Gwin, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Pearce, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Wade, Weller, and Williams—20.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now on referring the petitions to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALKER. I agree with my colleague on the Committee on Public Lands, [Mr. STUART], that these petitions, if they relate to a grant of public lands, and should be referred to any committee, ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands. What difference is there between this proposition and any one of those which have been sent to that committee, without objection, during the present session? Every proposition to grant lands for railroads has gone to it without a dissenting voice. This subject also went to the same committee, which reported against the proposition. Now, if I can understand this proposition to mean anything, it means that this shall go to the Committee on Commerce, with the expectation that it will overrule the decision of a committee equal with itself, and the committee to which the subject-matter of these petitions properly belongs.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MARCH 14, 1854.

NEW SERIES...No. 39.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that I voted against ordering the petitions to lie on the table, not for the purpose of overruling the decision of the Committee on Public Lands, but to give the Committee on Commerce an opportunity, if it brings in any general bill, to introduce this subject into it. It was my design not to have the decision of the Committee on Public Lands as to an appropriation of public lands overruled by another committee, but to let a proposition be made to appropriate money, if necessary.

Mr. WALKER. I doubt not that there were many who voted against ordering the petitions to lie on the table with no personal design to get at or overrule the former decision of the Committee on Public Lands; but it looks like it. The action of the Senate looks very much like it. It will be so thought. It will be deemed that the Senate, dissatisfied with the report of the Committee on Public Lands, are disposed to give this proposition into the control of another committee.

Mr. SEWARD. I think if the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me to make a remark, he will withdraw his objection. Petitions in relation to this subject were referred to the Committee on Commerce early in the session, and that committee have had them under consideration. Some of those memorials do incidentally ask for a grant of public lands. The Committee on Commerce have had, and now have, this subject under consideration. It is not now designed that the Committee on Commerce shall overrule the decision made by the Committee on Public Lands. We do not know what the Committee on Commerce will do; but that committee had the subject under consideration before the Committee on Public Lands. Now the proposition presented to us is to construct a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara. That subject is under the consideration of the Committee on Commerce. It is true that these petitions ask for a grant of public lands to aid in the work, but that is a mere incident, which can be dispensed with in reference to the work. I think that the honorable Senator from Wisconsin has this subject as deeply at heart as any man; but I think the Committee on Commerce is a very appropriate committee to which it should be referred, because the distinct proposition relates to the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara.

Mr. WALKER. I was not aware that this subject, in the form in which it is now before the Senate, had gone, either at an early or late day, to the Committee on Commerce. If petitions praying grants of public lands to aid in the construction of this work were sent to that committee, I think that I am not going too far when I say that the reference was an improper one. The Committee on Public Lands has had all kindred subjects before it; and so far from sending these petitions to the Committee on Commerce on the ground that others of a similar character have gone there, it seems to me that that committee ought to be discharged from the consideration of those petitions, and they should now be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I have no objection to the question of the construction of the work being sent to the Committee on Commerce, but when it is presented in the form of a proposition to give public lands for it, I think the Committee on Public Lands is entitled to have the matter under its consideration.

When the Committee on Public Lands proposed to be discharged from the consideration of this subject, I made some objection to it. I saw that the Legislature of Wisconsin had under consideration the subject of instructing the Senators and Representatives from that State to vote for granting public lands for the construction of the work. However, the majority of the committee asked to be discharged. If these instructions shall come—and a committee of the Wisconsin Legislature has already reported in favor of them—I shall obey them, and I shall obey them to a very extreme extent; for if the subject is not considered in any other shape by Congress, I shall propose a bill to grant lands to the State of Wisconsin to construct the work; for I cannot see that the Legislature of that State has any business to step out of the State and instruct me to ask public lands in any other State to aid in the construction of the work.

I shall, therefore, if it cannot be adopted as a general measure, propose to appropriate lands in Wisconsin to construct the work; and I want the Committee on Public Lands to have the subject-matter before it. I regret that that committee was so hastily discharged from the consideration of the subject, and I should be pleased to see it again go back to the committee, so that I may have some time to await the instructions from my Legislature. That Legislature, sir, is very prolific in instructions. I presume it will reach this subject. It did go so far from home as to instruct us in regard to the canal around the Falls of St. Mary; it has gone so far as to instruct us in regard to appointments to office out of the State; and it has now gone as far as Niagara Falls. I intend to obey its instructions, if they shall come; and I therefore wish very much that the subject should be before the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I trust that, under these circumstances, after the remarks of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, there will be no objection to the referring of these memorials to the Committee on Public Lands, even with instructions, if the Senator from New York desires them.

Mr. FISH. I hope they will not go to that committee. It has already expressed an opinion upon the subject; and by all parliamentary usage, I believe, a proposition is not to be sent to a committee whose opinion is known to be adverse to the object. The question now before us is on the reference to the Committee on Commerce. The subject-matter of the petitions pertains to that committee; and if, in asking for aid to carry out the general design, they ask something which, in the opinion of gentlemen, might send it to the Committee on Public Lands, will you give it a reference according to that prayer, instead of according to the subject-matter? I understand, further, that there are already, and have been for some weeks past, before the Committee on Commerce, petitions in precisely the same form with those which I now ask the Senate to send there.

Mr. GWIN. I hope this subject will go over until to-morrow. We have other important business before us which I should like to have transacted now.

Mr. FISH. Let the question be taken.

Mr. GWIN. I hope, then, it will be taken without further debate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understood the Senator from New York to say that other petitions of the same kind have been already sent to the Committee on Commerce. If that be so, I suppose there can be no objection to sending these there also; but if petitions asking for land have gone to the Committee on Public Lands, these ought to go to that committee. If the same subject is before the Committee on Commerce—if petitions have gone there asking for land—I see no reason why these should not go there. I presume there can be no objection to it.

Mr. STUART. I do not wish to continue this discussion, but I desire the true question not to be departed from. The ground upon which I placed my objection in the first place, was, that the rules of the Senate sent this business to the Committee on Public Lands; and I asked the sense of the Senate whether, that committee having reported upon the subject, they would send it to the Committee on Commerce to review that action? The Senate have decided that they would. As a member of the committee, I understand the vote to be neither more nor less than to say that the Senate are dissatisfied with the action of the committee to which this subject properly belongs, and they choose not to recommit it to that committee with instructions—which, in my humble judgment, would be the proper parliamentary course—but to send it to another committee.

You might just as well send it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, or the Committee on Military Affairs, or the Committee on Naval Affairs; because, so far as the action of this Government is concerned, a canal around the Falls of Niagara is much more important to the naval interests of the country than any other. The vote therefore determines—if they will override the action of the Committee on Public Lands—this: that the Senate—instead of taking a parliamentary way of recommitting the question to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to report a bill, if such is the sense of the Senate—see fit to transfer a subject which belongs to that committee to another committee, which has no jurisdiction whatever over it. The thing may receive any construction Senators choose; but the parliamentary construction is a direct censure upon the committee to which the subject belongs.

The motion to refer the petitions to the Committee on Commerce was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. GEYER, it was Ordered, That the petition of the legal representatives of Jacques Clamorgan be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. GEYER, it was Ordered, That the memorial of George Shoenberger and others be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Thomas Crown be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion by Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of Robert Sewell be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Thomas Dyer and others be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. STUART, it was Ordered, That the heirs of Henry Waller have leave to withdraw their memorials and papers.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred documents in relation to the claim of Mark Bean and Richard H. Bean, of Arkansas, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Thomas Frazer, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SLIDELL, in accordance with previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of John Boyd; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PETTIT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill to regulate the fees and compensation of the district attorneys in the courts of the United States, for the Territories of Minnesota, New Mexico, and Utah; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STUART asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill granting the right of way over, and depot grounds on, the military reserve at Fort Gratiot, in the State of Michigan, to the Port Huron and Lake Michigan Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BURLINGTON UNIVERSITY.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting the reversionary interest of the United States in the lot known formerly as "the city burial ground," in Burlington, Iowa, to the trustees of the Burlington University.

A paper on the subject, submitted by Mr. DODGE, was also referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. GWIN. The Select Committee to whom was referred the subject of a railroad from the Valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean, have instructed me to report "A bill for the construction of a railroad from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean." I will state, Mr. President, that there are other matters connected with this subject which the committee have not yet disposed of; and I am instructed by the committee to say, that they do not yet make a final report.

The bill was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. GWIN. I am instructed by the committee to move that the consideration of the bill be postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, this day two weeks. This subject is of great importance, and we desire that day fixed for its consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

VERMONT SENATORSHIP.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution respecting the right of the Hon. S. S. PHELPS to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. PHELPS continued the speech in advocacy of his right, which was left unfinished on Wednesday last, when he addressed the Senate on the same subject. The speech will be found in the Appendix.

Having concluded,

Mr. BADGER next addressed the Senate in reply to a portion of the argument of the gentleman from Vermont. [See Appendix.]

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, I desire, and deem it due to myself and to the State which I in part represent, to submit some remarks to the Senate upon the question now before us.

Mr. SEWARD. If the honorable Senator will give way I will move to postpone the further consideration of the subject, with a view to proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. FOOT. I will yield to the disposition of the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I make that motion.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the honorable Senator from New York withdraw that motion for a moment, to allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. SEWARD. Certainly.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. President, it is due to the honorable Senator from North Carolina, and it is due to myself, that I should disclaim the slightest disposition or consciousness of anything in my remarks, or in my manner, which should be offensive to the honorable Senator. It is due to myself, because, after a service of something more than twelve years in this body, although I have never mixed much in the ordinary current debates of the body, I believe I have never before been subjected to the imputation of uttering anything offensive to any gentleman in this body.

Mr. BADGER. Why, Mr. President, I thought my friend from Vermont understood me to say expressly that I had not the remotest idea that he intended any such thing. I thought I explained that. But I assure him I do not feel the smallest degree of offense—not the slightest—quite the contrary.

Mr. PHELPS. Well, sir, if there was no intention it must have been my misfortune, for which I am no more answerable than any gentleman is for the want of personal beauty. But one word more. The honorable Senator seemed to think that there was something, I suppose, in the remarks with reference to the significance of the word "then." I used that expression.

I have insisted from the beginning that the word "meeting," as used in the Constitution, meant the commencement of the legislative session. The honorable Senator took the ground that the word "meeting" was equivalent to the word session, and embraced the whole period of the session. I understood him to argue, in support of his interpretation of the word "meeting," that the word "then," which meant "at that period," settled the question that the word meeting must mean the whole session. That I understood to be the Senator's argument. My reply to it was this, in substance: you give the word "meeting" my interpretation to mean the commencement of the session, and then give the word "then" the ordinary signification to mean "afterwards," that was my understanding.

Mr. SLIDELL. I renew the motion to postpone the further consideration of this subject, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of Executive business.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 13, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Navy Department, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 27th ultimo, requesting the Secretary of the Navy to communicate to the House whether, in his opinion, the steamships employed in the ocean mail service are of a proper construction to be converted into vessels-of-war, in the event of their being required for such a service. The communication states:

The ocean mail steamers accepted by the Navy Department under contract are—

1st. Those running between New York and Liverpool, viz:

Atlantic, accepted April 30, 1850; built 1849.

Pacific, accepted May 15, 1850; built 1849.

Arctic, accepted October 10, 1850; built 1850.

Baltic, accepted November 7, 1850; built 1850.

2d. Those running between New York and New Orleans, Havana, and Chagres, viz:

Georgia, accepted January 26, 1852; built 1849.

Ohio, accepted January 24, 1851; built 1849.

Illinois, accepted September 30, 1851; built 1851.

George Law, accepted February 13, 1854; built 1853.

3d. Those running between San Francisco and Panama, viz:

California, accepted October 5, 1848; built 1848.

Panama, accepted November 28, 1848; built 1848.

Oregon, accepted December 9, 1848; built 1848.

Columbia, accepted October 1, 1850; built 1850.

Tennessee, accepted October 1, 1850; built 1848.

Golden Gate, accepted July 31, 1851, built 1851.

That the Tennessee was stranded on the coast, in the summer of 1853; and that the San Francisco recently lost at sea, was intended to supply her place.

That, from communications upon the subject from experienced naval constructors, and from the report submitted to the House in March, 1852, the Secretary of the Navy thinks, that while it is demonstrated conclusively that these steamers are admirably adapted for performing the service in which they are now engaged, he was of the opinion that the demonstration was also clear that the general principles of construction on which they are built are such that it is impracticable to convert them into vessels of war, to be relied upon for efficient service as men-of-war. They might, however, be made available in the transportation of men and munitions, and might be strengthened and rendered capable of bearing a small armament, such as would enable them to annoy the enemy's commerce, and do good service as privateers.

Before the reading of the communication was completed,

Mr. HAVEN said: As this seems to be a lengthy communication, without being read further, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOCOCK. I hope the gentleman will include in his motion that to print. It is necessary that it should be before the House in a printed form.

Mr. HAVEN. I will include the motion in that to refer.

The communication was then referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HUNT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

There was no objection, and Mr. HUNT proceeded to say:

Mr. Speaker, a debate of a personal character, in which I participated, took place in the Committee of the Whole, when we were last assembled. I have risen, sir, to correct, in substance, the report of it published in the Globe of Saturday last. The report abounds in errors; and is, I trust unintentionally on the part of the reporters, partial and unjust towards me, and attributes to me a style of expression entirely foreign to my character. But I shall look only to what I deem material in it. It omits an offensive part of the language used by the honorable member from Indiana, and presents his remarks so modified and softened as almost to give an air of captiousness to the just exception I felt it my duty to make on the occasion. In conformity with a determination not to submit to any misrepresentations of my conduct, I will now make the necessary corrections.

The honorable member from Indiana charged the honorable member from Maryland with having declared that he would mould the sentiments of his constituents, and not be moulded by their sentiments. The honorable member from Maryland endeavored to turn aside animadversion, by saying, "Not exactly." But the honorable member persisted in holding him to the expression—and continued, "The gentleman may mould the sentiments of his curly-heads; but thank God I represent a constituency that does not require five men to count as three;" and eulogized his constituents, and spoke these words with bitterness and scorn. I felt the language so uttered offensive to me, and to every Representative on this floor of a slaveholding constituency, and I excepted to it as out of order; and, in the course of the remarks I made to the Chair, I stated what it was. The honorable member from Indiana then declared that he did not cast any aspersions on members from slaveholding communities; but that he was replying only to the member from Maryland. Excited and dissatisfied, in common with, I believe, a majority of the House, at the bearing and language of the member, I claimed a right to reply to him. My friend from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] who was in the chair, anxious to prevent strife, and mistaking, I think, the application of the technical rule, in the case where the remark of the honorable member from Indiana had been allowed to pass without check, decided that I had no right to address the House. I respectfully took an appeal, which was sustained by a majority of the House present. Seeing the House in a state of ferment and confusion, I contented myself with remarking that I would pursue the matter no further, considering the action of the House as a sufficient rebuke of the honorable member from Indiana. To this the honorable member made a reply, which I did not hear, but which, on inquiry from my place, I was told, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DAWSON,] did not reflect personally on me.

On Saturday, sir, I read the report I have spoken of. I desire to call the attention of the honorable member from Indiana to the concluding remark in it, imputed to him:

"I will say to the gentleman from Louisiana, that if he intends to apply the term 'rebuked' to me for any sentiment I have uttered I laugh it to scorn! Yes, Mr. Chairman, to scorn! I have uttered no expression intended to disparage members upon this floor representing bond or free territory."

I now call upon the honorable member from Indiana to state whether he used the language of scorn and defiance personally and to me.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

Mr. HUNT. I beg that the gentleman will direct his voice this way, for I lost what he said on a former occasion.

Mr. LANE. I will endeavor to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the gentleman shall make his explanation?

[Cries of "Yes!" "Yes!"]

Mr. LANE. I had hoped that this personal explanation would have taken place when the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SOLLERS] was present; but as the gentleman from Louisiana has chosen to bring it forward now, I will, of course, respond. I have understood, I will say to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. HUNT,] that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SOLLERS] is quite sick; and I had hoped that this personal explanation would have been postponed until we had heard further in reference to his condition.

I desire, in the first place, Mr. Speaker, to make a general statement to this House. I am no advocate of slavery. I am no slavery propagandist; and yet my history will prove that I have gone as far, and will go as far, judging from that history, to maintain the constitutional rights of gentlemen representing slave States upon this floor, and maintaining the constitutional rights of their constituents. I will go as far in doing them justice in sustaining their constitutional rights as any man. I hail from a State that occupies the summit of the conservative position—the State of Indiana, the State of my birth, has said again and again that it knows no East, no West, no North, no South—that knows nothing but the Union, and the rights of the people of each and every State under the Constitution. I say that my history will prove that I have gone as far, and am willing to go as far, in sustaining the rights of the South, the rights of every State of this Union, as any man upon this floor, or elsewhere. I know no difference between northern and southern States. I shall know no difference. Brethren all—interested in perpetuating the harmony and integrity of this Union. I shall go as far as any of you in trampling out agitation in the North, and as far as any of you in trampling out agitation in the South, which is calculated to disturb the harmony of the Union.

So much for generalities. Now, as to this discussion. I do not see how I can refer to this discussion without the presence of the gentleman from Maryland. I do not see how I can do it, and yet I am compelled to, as the House will discover. The gentleman from Maryland, as the members will remember, was speaking of the influence of claims agents upon members of this House. When I heard him I stepped across the area, and called the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] to the sentiment expressed by the gentleman, and desired that he would respond. I kindly and courteously, as I thought, interrupted the gentleman from Maryland, and asked him to correct his remarks, that is, I called his attention to them. His response to me was, that I wanted to gain notoriety with him, and that he would teach me a lesson of wisdom. And what was that lesson? Why, that he would teach me to mould the opinion of my constituents, and not to be moulded by them. That was the retort to me of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SOLLERS.] He said that playfully. The remark was a playful one; and I so considered it. My retort was likewise a playful one. If the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT] understood it otherwise he misunderstood it, and was mistaken. It was a playful remark. What was the retort? The gentleman from Maryland tried to teach me a lesson from wisdom; and what was my retort? That the gentleman from Maryland must be mistaken about moulding the opinion of his constituents; and referred playfully to the presumption that he must have intended to allude to that portion of his constituency which required five to count three. It was a playful remark; and it was neither intended to be offensive to the gentleman from Maryland nor to any other gentleman on this floor.

The gentleman from Louisiana arose in his seat and complained of my remarks. Now, I ask every member of this House to look at my explanation in answer to his [Mr. HUNT's] complaint. Is it not full, perfect, complete, ample? My response was, that I did not intend to disparage Representatives on this floor of either bond or free territory. Could I go further? Was it not as ample as I could possibly have made it? The gentleman from Louisiana will bear in mind that I pressed as hard as any gentleman on this floor that the gentleman from Maryland as well as himself—the gentleman from Louisiana—should be heard. It was then in the confusion that I heard the word "rebuke" applied to me from the mouth of the gentleman from Louisiana. What was my response when I heard that word "rebuke"? It was that I laughed it to scorn.

Sir, I do not admit that the gentleman from Louisiana, or any other gentleman on this floor, has the right to "rebuke" me—the power, the authority, to "rebuke" me. No, sir, I deny the existence of such right. And let me say here, in all kindness, to the gentleman from Louisiana, that his reported remark is, I think, as unjust to me as my remark to him. There is no difference between us in that respect. His remark was that the House had, by their vote, vindicated the Constitution and rebuked me. Now what are the facts? I was as loud as any member of that committee in the expression of my desire to hear these gentlemen, [Messrs. HUNT and SOLLERS,] and my colleagues voted with the majority on that occasion—I myself did not vote on either side. It seemed to me that if any gentleman was rebuked by that vote it was the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] who was chairman of the committee; and I know that it was not intended as a rebuke to him, nor was it intended as a rebuke to any one. I repeat, sir, that I think that this very remark, as reported of the gentleman from Louisiana, is as unjust to me, as it is untrue in fact.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I reiterate that the entire discussion, on my part, was a playful one. It was not intended to be offensive to the gentleman from Maryland; and if the gentleman from Louisiana did not intend to apply the term "rebuke" to me, then my response to him is not offensive, because what I said was this:

"I will say to the gentleman from Louisiana that if he intends to apply the term 'rebuke' to me for any sentiment I have uttered, I laugh it to scorn; yes, Mr. Chairman, to scorn. I have uttered no expression intended to disparage members upon this floor representing bond or free territory."

That is the report, and I can only repeat, in conclusion, that I do not acknowledge the right of any gentleman upon this floor to rebuke me. It cannot be that he has any such power or authority. If the gentleman from Louisiana did not intend to apply that term to me I did not intend to apply to him the terms which I used. If he did, if he chose to assume that authority, I deny his authority, as my language plainly indicates. If, on the contrary, he presumed to utter such a term, I now state in reply to his question, that I did intend the language used by me on Friday last, to apply in response to the remark made by him on that occasion. He is to be the judge as to the application.

Before I take my seat, I will say, in conformity with a request which has just been handed me, that although Mr. SOLLERS is quite sick, he is better than he has been.

Mr. HUNT. I am sorry for the sickness of Mr. SOLLERS, but cannot, for the life of me, see how that circumstance can affect a question between the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] and myself, as to his intention to use the language of defiance and scorn towards me—

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, (interrupting.) I was not present when the gentleman from Indiana made his remark in reference to the health of Mr. SOLLERS, and being fearful that this rumor might reach his family, causing unnecessary apprehension, I think it proper to say that there is no ground for such a rumor as has reached the gentleman from Indiana.

I saw Mr. SOLLERS yesterday. He boards at the same house with me. Although he was quite sick yesterday morning he is much better, and at no time has he been in such a condition as to excite apprehension.

Mr. LANE. I am very glad to hear the explanation of the gentleman. I was informed, after I came into the House this morning, of the rumor which I stated.

Mr. HUNT. The gentleman commenced his remarks with some generalities, as he called them, and took occasion to laud the State of Indiana for her honor and patriotism, and for her respect for the Constitution of the United States. Sir, this vindication, if it is to be called such, was not brought forth by any remarks I had made. I said nothing of Indiana, or of any other State in this Union. The course I pursued was strictly in defense of southern States from the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, reflecting on the constituency of those States, and wounding my sensibilities, and the sensibilities of every gentleman representing a slaveholding constituency.

The gentleman now says that his retort was a playful one. Sir, upon my word, I never was more astounded since I was born. It was considered in quite a contrary light by every gentleman around me. The offense was general, and there was a general indignation. Every one near me, and, indeed, throughout the whole House, resented it as I did; and I believe I but spoke the feeling of every gentleman of sensibility both North and South who heard his remarks, and witnessed the manner of them. His manner was biting and scornful, his brow was knitted, and there was a sardonic play of his features, which indicated plainly and broadly that the sentiment he uttered did not proceed from a playful heart.

He says now that the remarks were uttered playfully. Really, sir, we live in such a strange world, and men play such fantastic tricks, that it is within the range of possibility that the gentleman intended to be playful. I hope, however, in consideration of the feelings of those with whom he is associated upon this floor, that he will hereafter abstain from the indulgence of this extraordinary species of play, which carries pain to the bosom of his fellow-members.

This is a matter which does not involve the character of Indiana, which no one has assailed, but the particular conduct of the gentleman from Indiana himself on a particular occasion. He has removed what was understood to be the gravamen of the offense. He stated that he had said nothing to call forth my remarks, and having said nothing to call them forth, he considered my comment as entirely unjustifiable, and that he, therefore, only replied to a remark of rebuke from me which had no foundation for its justification and support. Am I to sit silent, and hear sentiments expressed on this floor which every one felt as aspersing the character and the honor of the constituency I represent, and not respond in appropriate language of indignation and censure? But the gentleman now declares solemnly, after deliberation, that his remarks were made entirely in a playful mood. The rule of honor is, in these cases, to receive as true the assertions of an adversary. I must, therefore, receive what the gentleman says now as in earnest, hoping that hereafter he will be careful not to indulge in that kind of playfulness which resembles very much that of the cat when it pounces upon the mouse.

Sir, I am not captious. I am a man of honor, that would rather die than wound, without just cause, the feelings of another; but I am a man of sensibility, and so long as I have a voice to speak or an arm to raise, I will never submit to an affront in this place or any other.

"I'll right my wrong where it is given,
Were it even in the court of Heaven."

I now dismiss this matter, satisfied that I have been borne out in my whole course, from the commencement to the end of this discussion, with the approbation of every man of honor on this floor from the North and the South.

WILLIAM CARR LANE.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. MILLER,] lying over from last Monday, to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing a resolution in reference to paying the contestant from New Mexico per diem and mileage.

It was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to pay to William Carr Lane, who has contested the seat of José Emanuel Gallegos, the Delegate from New Mexico, the per diem and mileage allowed the Delegate from said Territory from the commencement of this session up to this day.

Mr. EDGERTON. Is the resolution before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The motion is to suspend the rules.

Mr. MILLER. I desire, with the consent of the House, that the yeas and nays may be withdrawn upon this motion, and that the matter may be referred to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object. We are just as well prepared to decide this question now as after the Committee on Elections have reported upon it.

The resolution was again reported.

The question was then taken upon the motion to suspend the rules, and the result was—yeas 70, nays 110; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Appleton, Benson, Benton, Campbell, Canthers, Chandler, Chase, Cook, Corwin, Crocker, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dick, Dickinson, Disney, Duibair, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Edmunds, Ewing, Farley, Franklin, Giddings, Goodrich, Greenwood, Grey, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Howe, Hunt, Kerr, Knox, Lindley, McCulloch, McDougall, Mace, Matteson, Middletown, John G. Miller, Morgan, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Pennington, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, Richardson, David Ritchie, Rogers, Sage, Sapp, Seward, Singleton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stratton, John L. Taylor, Upham, Valley, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Yates, and Zollcofer—70.

YATES—Messrs. Aikin, James C. Allen, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barksdale, Belcher, Bissell, Bocoock, Breckinridge, Bridges, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskie, Chamberlain, Chastain, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clingman, Cobb, Cox, Craige, Culom, Thomas Davis, Dean, Dent, De Witt, Dowdell, Drum, Edmundson, Eliot, Ellison, English, Faulkner, Florence, Fuller, Goode, Green, Grow, Hamilton, Sampson W. Harris, Hastings, Hibbard, Hiestler, Houston, Hughes, Ingersoll, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Kidwell, Kurtz, Letcher, Lilly, Lindsley, Lyon, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Macy, Maurice, Maxwell, May, Mayall, Smith Miller, Millson, Morrison, Murray, Nichols, Noble, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phillips, Powell, Pratt, Reese, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Russell, Sablin, Seymour, Shannon, Shaw, Shower, Simmons, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, Andrew Stuart, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Tweed, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walbridge, Westbrook, Wheeler, and Daniel B. Wright—110.

So (two thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

[A message from the Senate was received by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that it had passed bills of the Senate of the following titles, in which he was instructed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 247) to constitute Keokuk and Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, ports of delivery.

An act (No 157) to enable the United States to make use of the solar compass in the public surveys.

Also, informing the House of the passage of sundry private bills.]

BOUNTY LAND LAWS.

The SPEAKER stated the business next in order to be a motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. HIBBARD,] lying over from last Monday, to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing a resolution relative to changes in the bounty land laws.

The resolution was read, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws in relation to bounty lands, that whenever an applicant for bounty land under any act shall die, or may have died, after filing in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions his application, and evidence sufficient to substantiate the same, before the issue of any warrant thereon, the heirs of such applicant shall be entitled to receive a warrant for the same amount of land that the deceased would have been entitled to if living.

The question was put, and (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

The resolution was then introduced, and the question having been taken, it was adopted.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I desire to ask if this is not the day for calling the States for resolutions?

The SPEAKER. It is the day for calling the States for resolutions, and they are in order from the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I call for the regular order of business, and I hope the rules will be adhered to.

RELIEF FOR SAN FRANCISCO RESCUERS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise for the purpose of asking the unanimous consent of the House to submit a motion that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution which I had the honor to submit, and which was referred there some two months since, for the relief of the San Francisco rescuers. I make the request with a view of considering the joint resolution now. I think for our credit it is time that we should take up the matter and dispose of it in some way.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I hope we shall proceed with the call of the States for resolutions. If I understand it, the gentleman will have the right to make that motion when the State of Pennsylvania shall be called.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois object to the motion?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to suspend the rules, for the purpose of enabling me to submit the motion.

The question was put; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 103, noes 30.

Mr. McMULLIN. Is it in order to call for the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. McMULLIN. I wish to state to the House that I am sure they would not discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union if—

The SPEAKER. Discussion is not in order. Does the gentleman from Virginia demand the yeas and nays?

Mr. McMULLIN. I do.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only twenty-two members having voted therefor.

So (two thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

The question recurred upon the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the consideration of the joint resolution referred to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Can a majority discharge the committee? The joint resolution makes an appropriation, I believe; and it must, therefore, under the rules, have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion just made was to suspend the rules to enable a motion to discharge to be made. Now, will it not require a vote of two thirds to discharge the committee?

The SPEAKER. If the joint resolution contains an appropriation, it will require a vote of two thirds to have it considered in the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The effect of this vote would be to bring the bill before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. A majority can discharge the committee, but it will require a vote of two thirds to consider and pass the joint resolution in the House.

Mr. EWING. I would ask the Chair if a vote of two thirds has not already been obtained?

The SPEAKER. To submit the motion to discharge. The rule requiring the joint resolution to be considered in committee has not been suspended.

Mr. McMULLIN. Is it in order to discuss the question now?

The SPEAKER. The question of discharging?

Mr. McMULLIN. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether it is in order.

Mr. McMULLIN. I am perfectly satisfied that the House is acting under a misunderstanding in reference to this matter.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask the Chair if all questions are not debatable upon which debate is not prohibited by some rule of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not remember any rule having a bearing upon that particular point, and is of the opinion that a proposition to discharge the committee is debatable, just as a proposition to commit a bill is debatable.

Mr. McMULLIN. I regret that this question has been sprung upon the House at this time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a question of order. If debate arises upon this motion does it not go over?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The rules have been suspended that would have required it to go over.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The rules were suspended for the introduction of the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The rules were suspended for the purpose of presenting the proposition to discharge the committee, and of considering the propriety of that discharge.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to inquire if there is anything before the House after the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to suspend the rules has prevailed?

The SPEAKER. The motion before the House is to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR. From the joint resolution, and to put it upon its passage?

The SPEAKER. The proposition is merely to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the joint resolution; and the Chair decides that the propriety of so discharging the committee may be discussed.

Mr. TAYLOR. I thought the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] was entitled to the floor upon that proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania did not claim the floor at all, or he would have been entitled to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Have I a right to discuss the question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania waived his right.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not waive the right, if the question is open to discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must state that the gentleman did waive his right, because he did not even claim the floor until the gentleman from Virginia had commenced his speech.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Chair will understand that I did not mean to contradict him. If I have lost my right to the floor I yield with pleasure.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only means to say that the gentleman lost his right by not claiming it in season.

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield to the decision of the Chair with great pleasure.

Mr. McMULLIN. It is not my purpose now, or at any other time, to trespass upon the time of the House or to transgress its rules. I desire, therefore, at the outset to know if it is competent for me to discuss the merits of the proposition from the consideration of which it is proposed to discharge the committee?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia may refer to the character of the bill for the purpose of showing that it should be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. McMULLIN. It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that some time since a joint committee of the two Houses was raised, for the purpose of taking into consideration the meritorious conduct of the officers and crew of those vessels who rescued our suffering citizens who were aboard the San Francisco. I had the honor of being appointed one of its members. After various sessions, it made a report to this body which, I flatter myself, whenever it comes to be understood by gentlemen, will be most certainly voted down.

The committee has recommended that medals shall be voted to the officers and crews of the three vessels who rescued our citizens as stated, and to that I make no objection. I think that it is due from this Government to those distinguished and brave officers and crews that they should not only receive gold medals, but also a vote of thanks from this National Legislature.

But, Mr. Speaker, the committee has not stopped there. It has gone further. It has recommended the appropriation of $100,000, and it is to that portion of the report to which I particularly invite the attention of the House. It has recommended, I repeat, that $100,000 shall be placed in the hands of the President of the United States to be distributed between the officers and crews of the vessels which have been referred to. I ask members to take notice of this important fact. To these officers and crews have been already amply rewarded for their services, not by this Government, but by its citizens. They have received a vast amount of money. I have a memorandum of the amount in my desk, but I have not the time now to refer to it.

My purpose now is to ask the House not to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the subject, so that when it shall be proper to go into a discussion of the merits of the question I may have time to satisfy the House, which I flatter myself I can do, that the report of this joint committee ought not to be adopted. If Congress adopt the report of that committee what will be the effect? As to the $100,000, it does not amount to a drop in the bucket compared with what is to be the result hereafter. The effect will be to throw the entire commercial marine upon the Government of the United States in the way of paying for all patriotic and praiseworthy acts in rescuing citizens from wrecks. It is a dangerous precedent that is proposed to be set. Has it been the policy of this Government heretofore, is it the policy of this Government now, to make the entire commercial marine depend upon it, or upon the bounty, charity, and liberality of the commercial districts of the country? I repeat, that these officers and crews have already, as I shall be prepared to show at the proper time, received ample remuneration for their acts of patriotism and humanity, which, I admit, deserve the grateful thanks of the American Government and the American people. I would beg the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] not to press the consideration of this question. I had not expected that the House would have, by a vote of two thirds, agreed to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the subject. This subject was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where I supposed it would have been fully and amply discussed. The question having been sprung upon me thus unexpectedly, I beg the House now not to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the subject, and at the proper time I shall endeavor to satisfy the House that the report of the committee ought not to be adopted by this House.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to reply, Mr. Speaker, in a very few words, to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN,] who was a co-laborer with me on that committee; and I cannot forbear expressing my regret that he should have used the term of "springing" this motion on the House. Why, sir, as early as about the 12th of January last this committee was appointed, and in two weeks afterwards it reported to this House. Awaiting with all respect for the feelings of gentlemen opposed to it to be manifested, I proceeded, two weeks after this report was presented to the House, to move its consideration, and the honorable gentleman from Virginia requested that I would grant him another week to prepare himself for opposition to it, as he was about leaving the city, with which request I at once complied. Well, Mr. Speaker, this, like many other good intentions which we make, has grown old without fulfillment on our hands; and now, after two months' waiting, we are charged with "springing" this motion on the House, and we are told that at a proper time we shall have a discussion of this important question.

Sir, what is the proper time for the Congress of the United States to consider of its duties to others? What is the proper time for any man, or any congregation of men, to consider and discuss what they owe, and how they will discharge their debt of gratitude to their benefactors? There is no time like the present. And as the gentleman from Virginia proceeded in his remarks to consider the question which he should have asked to be brought before the House, I presume that I have a right to follow him in the discussion of this question; and that I am the more willing to do because I was the chairman of the committee to which this subject, on the part of the House, was referred; and it therefore becomes me, if I should not be able to justify the act which we ask this Congress to perform, at least to excuse and explain the motives through which that act is recommended to the House. And, Mr. Speaker, I shall take care that in this matter my feelings shall not get the better of my judgment, though I confess that my judgment in relation to it has been formed from the feeling which the heroism of those persons whom we ask Congress to reward has excited, and my hopes rest upon the conviction which I entertain of the proper feeling and judgment of this House in this matter.

Sir, it has been said, disparagingly, that $100,000 are to be appropriated as a reward to the rescuers of our shipwrecked citizens on the San Francisco, if this report be adopted. The honorable gentleman [Mr. McMULLIN] knows perfectly well—though this House may have forgotten—that that sum is the maximum which the President of the United States is empowered to give for this or a like purpose, if, on inquiry, he should find any person peculiarly worthy of his consideration. The committee to whom this matter was referred, although it did possess some means of obtaining information in regard to the services of those who assisted on that perilous occasion, did not feel that it could enter properly into all those particulars which besemed such a question, and the performance of such an important service; and the committee has therefore—with great propriety, I think—referred the settlement of such a matter to the President of the United States. They have thus referred it, because, as the Executive officer, he might claim a part of the pleasure of discharging the duty which we are undertaking; and in so referring it to the President of the United States, we give a larger nationality to the expression of our gratitude.

For my own part, I confess that I have been induced to vote for that in the committee for other reasons. He possesses the means of bringing together the information which could be acquired in no other way, and thus be enabled to form a correct judgment upon it.

But there is another motion, peculiar, I think, which should be quoted upon this occasion. The President of the United States is himself a man of sorrow and acquainted with this kind of grief. He can comprehend well what would be the feelings of those whose hearts have been crushed by such a calamity, and how others have been benefited, though he could not be, by the interposition of benevolence and heroism upon such an occasion. Therefore it is that I think it meet and appropriate that the President should be made the organ of our action.

The gentleman [Mr. McMULLIN] suggests that the sum is large. I say again, sir, that I suppose it is large, and will be large, but the maximum only is presented. If we consider the services performed, I, for one, should be ashamed if the sum were not large. Sir, the sufferings were great, the risks were great, and the deliverance of our friends and fellow-citizens was truly great. Therefore I think, whatever form of expression we use in regard to it, should bear something of greatness upon it. I cannot tell what would be the estimate which the gentleman from Virginia would make.

Mr. RICHARDSON. (interrupting.) I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, what the particular necessity is of urging this bill out of its usual course, and putting it upon its passage now?

Mr. CHANDLER. If the gentleman does not see it, I am afraid I shall not be able to enlighten him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am afraid the gentleman himself does not see it.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the gentleman does not perceive that the expression of gratitude looses its force by the lapse of time, I shall not be able to make him understand the necessity of urging this matter. Yet if the House will name a day this week, or next week, for its consideration, I will cheerfully consent to such an arrangement. But still I think on the whole we had better dispose of the matter now. I have but a few more remarks to make.

Mr. BISSELL. I wish to say that I hope the House will dispose of this subject to-day. It will consume more and more time the longer it is delayed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to say that we ought to have had his resolution, for which he moved a suspension of the rules, read. It seems to me that we have now nothing tangible before us.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moved to suspend the rules to enable him to introduce a resolution to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the joint resolution relative to the relief of sufferers by the disaster of the steamship San Francisco.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would ask that the resolution be read.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be, and the same is hereby, discharged from the further consideration of joint resolution of the House, (No 16,) and that the same be now put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] that that is not the motion upon which the House was called to act. To prevent any misunderstanding, it is necessary that we understand each other and each step that is taken in this matter. The Chair, in recognizing the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, understood that he moved a suspension of the rules, in order to enable him to submit a motion, that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, and that it did not embrace its consideration before the House.

Mr. CHANDLER. Should I not be entitled to make the motion for its consideration after the vote which has been taken?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman would be entitled to make that motion after the resolution has come into the House. The Chair thinks it his duty to notify the gentleman and the House as to any misunderstanding which is likely to occur.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is not the resolution now before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House. The Chair again states as he understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the motion made by him did not embrace the proposition to consider the resolution in the House. It is competent for the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of a joint resolution for the purpose of recommitting to a committee, or with the intention, on the part of the mover, when the committee are discharged from its further consideration, to move a suspension of the rules, which require all bills and resolutions that contain appropriations of money to be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is not for the Chair to determine what the purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was, except as expressed by the motion which he made, that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution. The Chair holds that it is competent to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the resolution; but embracing, as it does, an appropriation of money, he decides, under another rule—the resolution being before the House—that unless the rules be suspended it would have to go to the committee. Still the Chair holds that it would be competent to recommit it.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he move the previous question, and so get rid of this matter.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish simply to say, that I think we should progress in our business very pleasantly if we could dispose of this subject now. I presume every gentleman here has made up his mind in regard to it. I therefore move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The question now is, "Shall the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution now under consideration?"

The question was then taken; and, a division being had, there were—ayes 79; noes not counted. So the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I desire to move the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would inquire of the Chair if the rules must be suspended to enable the House to consider the resolution now?

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution, containing as it does an appropriation, cannot be first considered in the House without a suspension of the rules.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move then to suspend the rule requiring measures containing appropriations to be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union so far as this joint resolution is concerned.

The question was put; and 76 rose in the affirmative.

Mr. DEAN. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I demand tellers upon the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and CAMPBELL were appointed.

Mr. OLDS. I should like to ask the Chair a question. I understand that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union has been discharged from the consideration of this resolution. Now, suppose the House does not suspend the rule requiring it to be considered in committee, what will become of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It will then be competent for the House to recommit it, to refer it to another committee, or if they fail to dispose of it in any such way it must be returned to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then put; and the tellers reported—ayes 72; noes not counted.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of the day.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the joint resolution be recommitted to the select committee.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. McDUGALL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to enable me to report, from the select committee upon that subject, "A bill to provide for the establishment of railroad and telegraphic communication between the Atlantic States and the Pacific ocean, and for other purposes."

Mr. BOCOCK. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from California if he merely proposes to have the bill referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed?

Mr. McDOUGALL. That is my purpose.

Mr. JONES. If that is the gentleman's purpose I do not object.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business. That will bring up all these bills and resolutions.

The SPEAKER. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. BOCOCK. I do not withdraw it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I move to suspend the rules so as to enable me to introduce the bill.

The question was put; and, two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended.

The bill was then introduced, and read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I move that the rules be suspended, to enable me to move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, made the special order for the second Tuesday in May next, and printed.

Mr. HAYEN. I hope the House will not make this bill the special order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The second Tuesday in May has been named as the day for the consideration of this measure by the general consent of its friends.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and several members answered to their names.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to suggest to the gentleman from California—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is too late. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish, with the unanimous consent of the House, to make an inquiry of the gentleman from California.

The SPEAKER. Is it the unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman from Georgia be permitted to submit an interrogatory to the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS. I would inquire of the gentleman from California what time he proposes to make his bill the special order?

Mr. McDOUGALL. The second Tuesday of May next, which will afford two months' time for examination by members of the House into the provisions of the bill previous to its consideration here.

Mr. STEPHENS. I hope there will be no objection to making the measure proposed by the gentleman the special order for the time specified.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to special orders.

The question was then taken on the motion to make the bill a special order as indicated; and it was disagreed to, two thirds not voting in the affirmative—yeas 116, nays 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Banks, Barksdale, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Benton, Bissell, Breckinridge, Bridges, Bugg, Campbell, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chase, Chrisman, Churchwell, Cobb, Cook, Cox, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, De Witt, Dickinson, Disney, Dowdell, Drum, Dunbar, Eddy, Edmunds, Elliott, Ellison, English, Ewing, Florence, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Grey, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Hendricks, Henn, Hester, Hill, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, Roland Jones, Kerr, Knox, Lamb, Lane, Lindley, Lindsey, McDougall, McMullin, Mace, Macy, Matteson, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Ollis, Mordecai Oliver, Pennington, John Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Preston, Ready, Reese, Riddle, David Ritchie, Robbins, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Sapp, Shannon, Simmons, Singleton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Trout, Tweed, Upham, Vail, Walbridge, Walley, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Yates, and Zollicoffer—116.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Aiken, Thomas H. Bayly, Boccock, Brooks, Caskie, Chandler, Chastain, Clingman, Craig, Cullum, Cumming, Dent, Edmundson, Farley, Faulker, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Grow, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Haven, Hibbard, Houston, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Clancy Jones, Keitt, Kurtz, Lotcher, Lilly, McCulloch, McNair, McQueen, Maurice, Mayall, Meacham, Middlesworth, Millson, Morgan, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Bishop Perkins, Powell, Pratt, Pringle, Puryear, Seward, Seymour, Shaw, Skelton, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Tracy, Vansant, Wade, and Wheeler—60.

So the House refused to make the bill a special order.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on committing the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordering it to be printed. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection; and the order was accordingly made.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed; and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HIRAM POWERS—STATUARY.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution, which is one merely of inquiry:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing from Hiram Powers, the great American sculptor, now residing in Florence, Italy, some work of art, commemorative of American genius and history, and of such kind and character as will be an appropriate embellishment of the Capitol of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object to the introduction of the resolution, and call for the regular order of business.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to suspend the rules of the House, that the resolution may be introduced.

The question was taken; and the rules were suspended.

The resolution was then adopted.

CUBAN AGGRESSIONS.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. After consultation with the other members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire and report such action as may be necessary and proper for Congress to enable the President of the United States to redress the outrages recently committed on the flag of the United States, and the persons and property of its citizens, by the Spanish Government, or its officers, in Cuba, and to secure the United States from future danger or annoyance resulting from the action of the Spanish authorities.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I would have no objection to that resolution being adopted but for the adoption of a resolution the other day, on motion by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] calling on the President for information in reference to this subject. I think the resolution is somewhat objectionable. It assumes that an outrage has been committed, of which we have at present no certain information; and therefore it is that I make objection to its consideration.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Why, sir, it is a mere resolution of inquiry, and I do not see any point whatever in the objection offered to it by my friend from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the gentleman from Louisiana is objected to.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I move to suspend the rules of the House to admit it.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Will the Speaker direct the Clerk to report the resolution again, so that we may see whether it is debatable?

The resolution was accordingly read a second time.

Mr. HAVEN. Mr. Speaker, we in this part of the House could not hear what was said by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. BAYLY,] but, from the tenor of the remarks which we heard, we supposed that that committee had had perhaps some action on this subject. We are willing to do what may be deemed reasonable if the committee will only inform us what it is they desire.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] explain?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAYLY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say on that point that my friend from Louisiana [Mr. PERKINS] has offered a resolution of inquiry solely. That is all. He consulted the Committee on Foreign Affairs as to that point before he offered his resolution. I see no objection that can apply to it. It is purely a motion of inquiry.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Then I desire to withdraw my objection to the resolution; and have merely to say, that my only motive in objecting to it was, that the gentleman from Alabama introduced a resolution making a call on the President of the United States for information on the subject, which information I suppose the House will receive in a day or two; and that this resolution of the gentleman from Louisiana assumed—in advance of the response of the President to the resolution of the gentleman from Alabama—that an outrage had been committed. I consider this assumption premature; but if the Committee on Foreign Affairs desire that the resolution now before the House be offered I withdraw my objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is it the unanimous consent of the House to permit the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his objections to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Then the question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana to suspend the rules.

Mr. DEAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I ask for tellers on the motion to suspend the rules; and I beg leave to say again to the House that this is merely a resolution of inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Virginia that the yeas and nays have already been demanded on that question, by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN.]

Mr. DEAN. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. DEAN. Then I withdraw my call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The question then recurs on the demand for tellers, made by the gentleman from Virginia, on the motion to suspend the rule.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS and VAIL were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes were not counted.

So the rules were not suspended, two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE here obtained the floor.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I will yield for a single moment, if I do not thereby lose my right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot recognize any bargain between members.

Mr. LANE. I will not ask the floor if the House refuses to grant the motion I wish to make, and that is, that the third week in April be set apart for the consideration of territorial business.

Mr. HAVEN. I object. I would do as much as any one to help the gentleman from Oregon, but I object to making special orders at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire whether the gentleman from Kentucky has yielded the floor?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I have not.

Mr. LANE. The gentleman will allow me to make an inquiry of the gentleman from New York? [Mr. HAVEN.]

The SPEAKER. Both gentlemen cannot occupy the floor at the same time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I have not yielded the floor, and I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view to take up the deficiency appropriation bill.

The question was put; and there were, upon a division, ayes 90, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The first business in order before the committee is a Senate joint resolution, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the expenses of codifying and revising the revenue laws.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. If it be in order, I move that that bill be laid aside, and that the House take up the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. GROW. I wish simply to call the attention of the committee to this bill. These codifiers have been at work ten months, and have not received a cent of pay. It is no more than just that this House should make appropriations to pay for work which they have ordered by law.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I would be very happy to yield to the gentleman; but I am under instructions, and I feel bound to make my motion that we lay aside the bill which has been read, and that we take up the deficiency bill.

Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania. I will remark, in relation to the bill first in order upon the Calendar, and which has already been read, that it will not occupy over ten minutes.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The question is not upon passing over the bill in question, but it is upon the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the committee will now proceed to the consideration of the deficiency bill.

The question was then taken upon Mr. BRECKINRIDGE's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the committee agreed to take up the

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be taken up and considered by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, that course will be pursued.

The first section of the bill was then read, as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1854, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely,"

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move to amend by striking out the first section of the bill.

Before the usual course of debate is commenced upon everything, I wish to say a few words in relation to the bill now under consideration. After I have said a few words, I propose to yield the floor to gentlemen, who will take up other subjects, as usual, that have no reference to the bill now before the committee.

A few days ago I submitted to this House a resolution, that when the Committee of Ways and Means wished to change, in any respect, the estimates of the Government, that they should report to the House the reasons therefor in writing. Objection was made to the introduction of the resolution, which was a fair, reasonable request, as I thought, on my part. The six free States of the Northwest, it is well known, are entirely disfranchised upon the Committee of Ways and Means. We have no voice there, and we cannot be heard in that committee. The Administration sent in estimates, from the different Departments, to this House, and those estimates, so far as I examined them, were perfectly satisfactory. The Administration were anxious to have those estimates of the Departments carried out by this House. Among these estimates there were some of vital importance to the northwestern States. I do not know the reasons which have actuated the Committee of Ways and Means in striking out those estimates. They may have very good reasons for doing so. The majority of that committee belong to the same party to which I profess to belong.

I would like to sustain a Democratic Administration; but when a Democratic Committee of Ways and Means are at war with a Democratic Administration upon matters of such importance to my section of the country, am I asking too much when I ask that the Committee of Ways and Means shall submit in writing their reasons for differing from the Administration? I have these estimates placed upon my desk—estimates of much importance to my constituents. I cannot be heard before that committee in reference to the necessity or propriety of these estimates; but in looking over the bill before the House I find these estimates have been stricken out. Stricken out for what reason? I understand—for I was not present myself at the time—that the main reason for defeating the first deficiency bill was that the House had voted in these estimates.

I do not know what may have been the reasons causing that defeat, but I will say, as a matter of compromise to the Committee of Ways and Means—for I shall only trouble the committee but a few moments longer—that if they will agree to put into the bill the estimates as they come from the Departments, I will go with them in voting out of the bill everything that does not come recommended by some one of the Departments.

Sir, I desire to stand by the Administration, and I desire that the Committee of Ways and Means shall aid me in doing so. But, sir, the estimates are here, and the Committee of Ways and Means have never told us why they have stricken them out of this bill. I think it is the right of the House—it would, in my opinion, add much to the peace and harmony of the country, it would add much to the confidence of the country in the Committee of Ways and Means—if that Committee, whenever they strike out estimates presented by the Departments, will give their reasons therefor in writing. Let them, when they report an appropriation bill, have the estimates printed along with their reasons for striking them out.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am anxious to pass this deficiency bill, and I will sustain the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in pressing it to a vote at as early an hour as possible. I will sit with him here as long as he chooses to finish the bill, if he will adopt this course and put in it the estimates coming from the Departments. But I must say that I shall go with those who will aid me in getting these estimates inserted in the bill.

Now, sir, I will tell the House what I think is due to the Democratic party: If we, as a party, intend to stop the construction of certain public works—if we, as a party, undertake to say that such and such custom-houses shall not be completed, or that such and such a marine hospital shall not be completed, is it not due to us that the Committee of Ways and Means shall bring in a bill providing for the sale of the sites and of the custom-houses themselves? What are we to do with them? What can we do with them? They remain as a monument of—what? Are they a monument of the policy of the Democratic party that they begin and will not finish? Is it not a monument of the cowardice of the Democratic party, that they begin and will not finish, but are afraid to sell?

Now, sir, I know it was used very strongly against Mr. Van Buren when he was President, that he ordered the sale of certain public works—that he ordered the timber and materials to be sold, thereby showing unmistakably that he did not intend to finish these public works. But in this case we are entirely ignorant as to what is to be done with these custom-houses and marine hospitals. You will not complete them, and you will not bring forward any measure for their sale, and I certainly hope that if these buildings are not to be completed a bill will be brought into this House showing to the country what our true policy is. Our policy must be either to complete these works or to sell them.

I do not intend to say anything about the particular merits of these several custom-houses. I know nothing about any of them, except a very few. But if there are any of them that ought not to be completed I think our friends on the Committee of Ways and Means ought to point out which they are, and if there are any that ought to be completed they should say so. But let us know the ground upon which we stand.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will avow this much in relation to the public works in the West. I will go with the Committee of Ways and Means in inserting in their deficiency bill all the works for which the Department have put in estimates, and which they wish to have completed; and I will go with them, also, to keep out of the bill all those works which have not been heretofore provided for or authorized by law. I now yield the floor to those who have speeches to make for home consumption.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I do not wish to detain the committee at this time upon this bill, but I feel it due to myself to say something in reference to these appropriations which have been made for custom-houses, and especially in reference to the proposition to make a long lease at a high price, with an alternative proposition to purchase the property for which the lease has been made, in the city of New York. I happen to know something of the history of most of these appropriations for custom-houses; and I beg leave to say here, in my own vindication, that I have never known laws more recklessly violated than all of those laws have been.

Many of these appropriations for the erection of custom-houses originated at the time that I was chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and in every one of them we put a provision requiring that such a plan should be adopted as that in no event would more money be expended than was then appropriated. If there is an exception to that rule I am not aware of it. We appropriated so much money, and we required in each of those cases that no more money should be expended than was appropriated. If anybody will look at the terms of those laws they will find that we left a margin for architects. As sensible men we knew very well that we could not define precisely what many of those buildings would cost. We left a margin, therefore, for architects, and in those bills we invariably provided that the expenditures should in no event exceed the appropriations made.

I think that in that matter there has been a gross disregard of the will of the Congress by the power that administers the distribution of this fund. I make no exception in any case. We made specific appropriations. We made a condition in those appropriations, which has been utterly disregarded in every case.

But, sir, I think the most palpable disregard of the will of the Congress which has been made at all has been in respect to this question, which precisely arises in the case now before the committee. I have not read the bill; but, if I understand it correctly, there is an appropriation to purchase the lots in Wall street, New York city, adjoining the custom-house there, for which upwards of $500,000 are to be given. It was not the meaning of Congress, as I undertake to say from a pretty accurate knowledge of the views of the House on the subject, it was never the meaning of Congress that $500,000 were to be expended for the establishment of an assay office in New York city. We all know—you know, Mr. Chairman—the contest that was had upon this floor on that point. We never designed that a Mint, with all its appliances, was to be built up in New York. The judgment of the House was against it. There was not a reason on the face of the earth which could address itself to a disinterested man in this body to bring him to the conclusion for the establishment of a Mint there. You could, with one tithe of the interest on this very investment of $500,000, have sent every man's gold from the city of New York to Philadelphia for coinage. I think that all the gold which ever arrived in New York could have been sent to Philadelphia to be coined for $15,000. I speak after some little examination of this matter. I do not think that I am mistaken; and I say that the interest on the very money that is proposed to be given for those banking houses in New York, adjoining the custom-house, would pay for carrying every man's gold to Philadelphia, and insure its transmission there and back. I am quite sure that I am not mistaken in these facts. We were pressed on here, as all will recollect, to remove the Mint from Philadelphia to New York.

My own opinion is now, as it always has been, that there should be but one Mint in this country, as I believe there is but one Mint in any other country. I do not believe that in Russia, or in France, or in England, or anywhere else, there is more than one mint; and I would willingly vote this morning to abolish every one of your Mints, in Georgia and elsewhere, and would also vote to take the Mint from Philadelphia, and to locate it in the District of Columbia.

I would do that upon principle, and not because I entertain any jealousy of the city of Philadelphia. I think there ought to be but one Mint in each nation, and that that Mint ought to be at the seat of Government.

Sir, I am opposed, as I always have been, to the removal of the Mint from Philadelphia to New York; and I did suspect—as I now see that I truly and reasonably suspected—that even in the establishment of that assay office in the city of New York, a nucleus was to be made by which the coinage of money in the United States—its legal coinage—was to be carried to Wall street.

Mr. FLORENCE, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to call his attention to a fact which very forcibly applies to the subject he is discussing? I mean the expense attending the establishment of the assay office in the city of New York?

Mr. BAYLY. Oh, I understand all that.

Mr. FLORENCE. But let me say that I find here in lines 104-'5-6-'7-'8-'9 of the 5th page of the deficiency bill, that $46,400 is required to be appropriated to pay for the service of officers' clerks and workmen in the assay office of New York. Forty-six thousand four hundred dollars! This large appropriation of money may have been overlooked by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY:] hence my desire to call his attention particularly to it. That, in connection with the fact that all the bullion arriving in New York, to be either assayed or refined in that office, can be carried to Philadelphia at the cost of transportation of only $15,000 a year is, in my judgment, a very important item for consideration at this time; and I desire to have the consent of the gentleman from Virginia to refer to this subject just at this point in his remarks, because I consider it of great importance in support of his argument.

Mr. BAYLY. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is perhaps a very pertinent point—as I have no doubt you will recognize it to be—for the gentleman from Philadelphia to make—

Mr. FLORENCE, (resuming.) Well, now, that fact, taken in connection with this, that $53,000 is also to be paid—

Mr. BAYLY, (interrupting.) But I have nothing to do with the interests of Philadelphia or New York on this point. [Laughter.] Nothing at all. I am looking at the matter in the light in which it concerns us all, all the citizens of the United States.

Mr. FLORENCE. I only want to show that this assay office is an immense burden upon the Treasury; costing, as it does, $100,000 a year, or perhaps more, when less than one fifth the sum is sufficient for the purpose—

Mr. BAYLY, (interrupting.) The gentleman from Pennsylvania has shown that remarkably well; and I am very much obliged to him for the assistance he has rendered me in the argument. But it does not happen to touch the point of my argument at all. [Laughter.]

Sir, the whole question of these Mints is a question of Government patronage, and it has been so from the beginning. It has never been anything else than a question of Government patronage. There ought to be, I argue, but one Mint. There is no hardship in requiring the people of the country to carry their gold to the Mint. I admit here to-day—as I admitted some years ago—that so far as California is concerned, there was an exception in the predicament in which that State found herself. There was the locality where most of the gold to be coined was collected. There was great propriety, therefore, in allowing, at least, an assay office there. I had no difficulty whatever in voting to do so. But there is no use for all these Mints. Whenever we have had propositions here to remove the Mint from Philadelphia to New York, they have been defeated. This proposition to purchase these houses adjoining the custom-house is nothing on the face of the earth but to consummate purposes which Congress did not contemplate; that is, to have two Mints, one in New York and one in Philadelphia, within ninety-five miles of each other, or, so far as insurance is concerned, within a quarter of one per cent. of each other, and in fact less than that. Is this Government to give five hundred thousand dollars for an assay office in New York when it has already a Mint in Philadelphia, which is within a quarter of one per cent., or less, of the Mint itself, so far as carriage and insurance is concerned? My opinion is, that it would be a most unjustifiable and reckless expenditure of the public money. I do not think that the Congress of the United States, when they appropriated money to establish an assay office in New York, contemplated any such thing.

Well, I know that the Committee of Ways and Means come before us—for every member of which I have the greatest respect—and tell us it is economy to do it; that they have agreed for such a lease, but that they can save money by buying these lots. Why were they leased? I understand, from authority upon which I place great reliance, that for five thousand dollars—I will not say for fifty, or seventy-five, or a hundred thousand dollars—but for five thousand dollars spaces in New York could be bought which would be quite as convenient as this lot. But gentlemen come here and say it is a convenient thing to have an assay office near the custom-house. Why have it near the custom-house? Why not have it a mile off, upon any avenue upon which an omnibus runs? Is there any difficulty in that? The man who has gold enough to have it refined can have no difficulty in going a mile or two to have it assayed at the public expense, when it is to be for his benefit? None at all.

Suppose he has to go a mile or two, has he any right to complain of that? Suppose he has to go further, and make a journey of ninety miles to Philadelphia to have his gold coined, has he any right to complain of that? I do not think he has. I do not think that by buying a lot immediately adjoining the custom-house you thereby promote the convenience of men who have gold to assay. Five hundred thousand dollars for two lots in Wall street! The Committee of Ways and Means come here and ask us to buy the old sites of two banks in Wall street. They tell us, that it is a matter of economy to purchase these sites; and how do they make out their case? How do they attempt to prove that it is a matter of economy to make such a purchase. They pile Pelion upon Ossa. They show first that they have given $50,000 or more for a lease of buildings to use as an assay and refining office, and then, after giving this enormous price, they come to the conclusion that it would be better to buy the building.

The only justification whatever that they give for the proposition to purchase is the enormous price that they have given for the lease of the property. I do not speak without having made inquiries into this matter, and I know the facts of which I speak. I know that a site just as convenient and as well suited for all the purposes for which an assay office is wanted, and for which it is now proposed to appropriate $500,000, can be purchased for $5,000. I know how this thing will result. I predicted years ago that it would end in this way, and that you would have Mints established in New York and in Philadelphia—about ninety miles distant from each other. It was ignored at the time. It was denied that there was any such purpose in contemplation; but that is what it is coming to, and I desire now to wash my hands of it. I do not mean to vote for any $500,000 to buy this Wall street assay office.

Paris, it is said, is France. I do not want New York to become the United States, and I do not want especially that Wall street shall become New York. There is no reason on the face of the earth—and I desire any gentleman to reply to me if he can—I say there is no reason upon the face of the earth why this assay office should be put into Wall street rather than in any other street in the city of New York. I think—and I desire to express the opinion before the committee—that the lease of that Wall street property was in direct contravention of the intention of Congress, and that it was improper in every respect.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN obtained the floor and said: I believe, Mr. Chairman, that as the House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, general discussion is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. CUTTING. Is the gentleman from Indiana entitled to go on with his speech? I thought either the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] or myself was entitled to the floor.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I thought I was properly entitled to the floor, but I do not claim it, because I did not understand it to have been awarded to me.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not wish to trespass upon any man's right to the floor. I ask the Chair to decide who is entitled to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled; it having been awarded to him by the Chair.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I would inquire of the gentleman from Indiana whether he desires to address the committee at this time?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is for that purpose that I have risen.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I have only to remark, that at a proper time I desire to make a brief explanation of the bill. If the gentleman will yield the floor for that purpose I will do so now; if not I shall do it when a proper opportunity occurs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark that it is customary to award the floor to the gentleman reporting a bill to open the discussion upon it; and, in accordance with the custom, it would have been proper to have recognized the gentleman from Kentucky in preference to the gentleman from Indiana. The Chair, however, did award the floor to the gentleman from Indiana, and if he desires it he may proceed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN obtained the floor, and addressed the committee in opposition to the repeal of the Missouri compromise, as contained in the Nebraska bill. His speech will be published in the Appendix.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. HENN. Will the gentleman give way to allow me to move that the committee do now rise?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I was about to make that motion myself. Before doing so, however, I will say to the committee that I shall improve the first occasion in making a brief explanation of the bill now under consideration. It is immaterial to me whether I proceed to do it now or wait till to-morrow.

Several MEMBERS. It is too late now. Make it to-morrow.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Then I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put, and the motion agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. CHANDLER] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly bill of the House (No. 271) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1854, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BOCOCK. I appeal to my colleague to withdraw that motion to allow me to introduce a resolution which it is very important should be adopted. It will occupy but a short time.

Mr. LETCHER. I withdraw the motion.

APPOINTMENT OF CADETS AT WEST POINT.

Mr. BOCOCK. I wish to state to the House that a difficulty has arisen in relation to the appointment of cadets among the vacant congressional districts, growing out of the fact that there has been a rearrangement of congressional districts in some of the States, by which two cadets in some instances are thrown into one district. After consultation with the Secretary of War and with many gentlemen of this House, I have prepared a joint resolution, for the introduction of which I ask the unanimous consent of the House, and to which I hope there will be no objection. It is

A joint resolution explanatory of the law regulating the number of military cadets to be appointed to the Military Academy at West Point.

[Cries of "Read for information!"]

It was then read through by the Clerk. It provides, that nothing in any act of Congress now contained shall be construed to deprive any congressional district in the United States of its right to a cadet at the Military Academy at West Point; but that whenever, by a rearrangement of the congressional districts in any State, more than one cadet shall be thrown into the same congressional district, notwithstanding said fact, there shall be appointed, in the manner now prescribed by law, one cadet for every other district from which there may be no cadet at said institution, to be entered at the commencement of its next regular session.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received, and read a first time by its title.

Mr. BOCOCK. I hope there will be no objection to the resolution, but that it will be passed at once.

Mr. PRESTON. I would ask the gentleman from Virginia, as I did not hear the language of the resolution very distinctly, whether or not it increases the number of cadets by leaving one for each of the old districts, and awarding one to each of the new also; or whether it provides that the number shall be the same, and merely declares that one shall come from each congressional district in the Union?

Mr. BOCOCK. If the gentleman will allow me to make a statement I can in two minutes give him and the House the information he desires.

Mr. PRESTON. I yield the floor to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. BOCOCK. The law now existing on this subject has two provisions. The first is, that there shall be appointed to the Military Academy at West Point as many cadets as there are representatives in the Congress of the United States. That is the first provision. Then there is another provision that there shall be one appointed from each congressional district.

Now the question arises with the Secretary of War, when there is a conflict between those provisions, which shall be the ruling requirement? He holds himself bound by the first, that is, that there shall be no more cadets at the Military Academy than there are congressional districts. A difficulty has arisen from the rearrangement of the congressional districts. Take my own State, for example. We had fifteen districts before; we have thirteen now, and in the rearrangement, counties from which cadets had been appointed for one district have been thrown with counties from which cadets had been appointed for another district. At the present time, there is one district in the State of Virginia from which there are two cadets. They are both in the Academy and have been there for two years. The Secretary of War has no power to get rid of them. If those two cadets are left in, of course, if the Secretary holds himself bound by the requirement that there shall be no more cadets from that State than there are congressional districts, some other congressional district must be left vacant. The Secretary has written to inform us that there are six vacancies for the State of Virginia, and seven districts from which the cadets to fill them are to be appointed. Now, how is it to be determined which of the seven districts shall be left vacant, and which not?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman how many cadets this joint resolution would add to the present number?

Mr. SKELTON. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BOCOCK. Let me get through with my statement.

Mr. SKELTON. I want to know if this resolution is before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SKELTON. I did not hear the Speaker ask if there was any objection to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so asked.

Mr. SKELTON. I intended to have objected, but no opportunity was given me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair certainly asked if there was any objection to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. PRESTON. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Virginia, to enable him to conclude his statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia will suspend until the joint resolution has been read a second time. It will then be open for amendment.

The joint resolution was then read a second time by its title.

Mr. BOCOCK, (resuming.) I have the floor by the consent of the gentleman from Kentucky, and I desire to answer the question propounded to me by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.] The Secretary of War informed me on Saturday that the total increase for the whole United States would be eight cadets, and at the first examination, in the ordinary course of things, by the rejection of those who do not come up to the requirements, by dismissal for bad conduct, and other causes, the excess will probably be reduced; at any rate at the end of one year there would be only three excess, and at the end of two years there would be only an excess of one; a contingency which, he informs me, would in no way affect the efficiency of the institution to accommodate cadets, and would not be in any way unacceptable to him, the institution, or the country.

Mr. PRESTON. I understand the gentleman from Virginia to only ask temporarily eight cadets?

Mr. BOCOCK. That is all.

Mr. PRESTON. I do not desire to embarrass the gentleman. I understand him to say that the difficulty now existing will begin to rectify itself at the expiration of the present cadetship?

Mr. BOCOCK. At the expiration of this academic year, even if there be no dismissals, which is never the case. At the end of two years there will be only an excess of one, and at the end of three years there will be none.

Mr. PRESTON. I am willing to pass the resolution, without throwing any embarrassment in the way. I knew it increased the number of cadets, but not to what extent. I assumed the floor to obtain an explanation from the gentleman from Virginia. Having obtained it, and, inasmuch as I think the resolution ought to be passed at once, and I do not desire to debate it, I call for the previous question.

The question was then put on seconding the call for the previous question; and, on a division, there were—ayes 68, noes 23; no quorum.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his call for the previous question, and move to refer the resolution to some of the committees, that it may be kept before the House.

Mr. PRESTON. I am of opinion that it is best to pass the resolution now. I, therefore, adhere to my call for the previous question. I demand tellers on seconding the call.

Mr. SKELTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn; there being, on a division—ayes 35, noes 63; no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain whether there is a quorum present or not.

Mr. SKELTON. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. PRESTON. With the permission of the House I shall withdraw my call for the previous question.

Mr. BOCOCK. Oh, no! There is a quorum present; and we can vote down the motion that there be a call of the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for tellers on the motion that there be a call of the House.

Tellers were not ordered. The question was then put; and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I wish to ask the Speaker whether the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PRESTON] could not let this matter be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs now, and then in the morning move to reconsider the vote by which it was so referred, and thus make it all right?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky might do so if he thought proper. The pending motion before the House is a demand for the previous question.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, there is not a quorum of members present in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

After a count, the Speaker announced that there was no quorum in the House—there being only 103 members present.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PRESTON. I believe, Mr. Speaker, I had the floor, and I now desire to shift the question. I therefore withdraw the motion for the previous question, and move to refer the joint resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, there is no quorum present, and therefore the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky cannot be regularly acted on.

The SPEAKER. It cannot. A motion to adjourn has been made by the gentleman from New York, and that is the motion now before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would ask the Chair whether, if the motion for adjournment is carried now, the joint resolution would go as No. 11 on the list of business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. ORR. And would it be in order to consider it in that order?

Mr. SPEAKER. Such is the universal practice.

The question was then put on the motion to adjourn; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. PRESTON. I claim the floor for the purpose of pressing the motion which I made before. I withdraw the call for the previous question, and I move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SKELTON. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order to make any such motion when there is no quorum present?

The SPEAKER. The motion can be made and entered, but cannot be acted on while there is no quorum present.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put and agreed to.

The House thereupon (at four, p. m.) adjourned till to-morrow, at twelve, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 14, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. WALKER presented the petition of James Lawrence and others, praying the establishment of a weekly mail from Richland Centre to Newport, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLAY presented a memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, praying that a grant of land may be made to complete the geological survey of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, praying that the right of way may be granted, and a donation of land made, to aid in the construction of such railroads as have been chartered by the State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PEARCE presented the memorial of William D. Merrick and Benjamin C. Howard, special agents of the State of Maryland, asking for the passage of an act to explain and correct the erroneous construction of a law of Congress, approved 13th May, 1826, authorizing the payment of interest due the State of Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

CLERICAL PROTEST.

Mr. EVERETT. I have been requested to present a memorial, remonstrating against the passage of the Nebraska bill. It is signed, as I am informed, by three thousand and fifty clergymen of all denominations and sects in the different States of New England—perhaps a very large majority of the members of the clerical profession in those States. There are, I am informed, three thousand eight hundred clergymen of all sects and denominations, and this is signed by over three thousand. I have been requested to present it for the consideration of the Senate, and I hope that it will receive the attention due to the large number of clergymen by whom it is signed, and the great weight of opinion displayed in it on the part of the members of that profession. I move that it lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS subsequently rose and said: A memorial has been ordered to lie on the table, which was presented a few minutes ago by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT.] I desire to submit a word or two of comment upon it, and therefore I wish to have it read. I think it is not respectful to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois moves to take up the memorial which was ordered to lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would now like to have the memorial read.

It was read, as follows:

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, clergymen of different religious denominations in New England, hereby, in the name of Almighty God, and in his presence, do solemnly protest against the passage of what is known as the Nebraska bill, or any repeal or modification of the existing legal prohibitions of slavery in that part of our national domain which it is proposed to organize into the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas. We protest against it as a great moral wrong, as a breach of faith eminently unjust to the moral principles of the community, and subversive of all confidence in national engagements; as a measure full of danger to the peace and even the existence of our beloved Union, and exposing us to the righteous judgments of the Almighty; and your protestants, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS, March 1 1854.

Mr. DOUGLAS. My only object is to call the attention of the Senate to the memorial. It is presented, after the final vote of the Senate, as a protest against our action—against the action in which largely more than two thirds of this body concurred. It protests against our action as being a breach of faith, as involving a moral wrong, as destructive of all confidence, and as subjecting us to the righteous judgment of the Almighty. It is presented, too, by a denomination of men calling themselves preachers of the Gospel. Sir, it has been demonstrated in debate that there is not a particle of truth in the allegation of a breach of faith or breach of confidence. It has been demonstrated so clearly, that there is no excuse for any man in the community for believing it any longer. Yet, here we find that a large body of preachers, perhaps three thousand, following the lead of a circular, which was issued by the Abolition confederates in this body, calculated to deceive and mislead the public, have here come forward, with an atrocious falsehood and an atrocious calumny against this Senate, desecrated the pulpit, and prostituted the sacred desk to the miserable and corrupting influence of party politics. It matters not whether the description is confined to narrow limits, or whether it extends to all the clergymen of New England. It matters not whether the misrepresentation has taken a broad scope, or been confined to a few; I hold it as our duty to expose the conduct of men, who, under the cloak of religion, either from ignorance or willful misrepresentation, will avail themselves of their sacred calling to arraign the conduct of Senators here in the discharge of our duties. Sir, I hold that this Senate is as capable of judging whether our action involves moral turpitude, whether it involves the subversion of morals, whether it subjects us to the judgment of the Almighty, as are these political preachers, whose protest proves them to be without any reliable information upon the subject. It is evident, sir, that these men know not what they are talking about. It is evident that they ought to be rebuked, and required to confine themselves to their vocation, instead of neglecting their flocks, and bringing our holy religion into disrepute by violating its sacred principles, and disregarding the obligations of truth and honor, by presenting here a document which is so offensive that no gentleman can indorse it without violating all the rules of courtesy, of propriety, and of honor.

Sir, there seems to be an attempt to pile upon our table offensive document after offensive document, slander after slander, libel after libel, in order that the Abolition press may copy it as coming from the records of the Senate, and go back and give it credit in the country. They are smuggled in here, the offensive matter concealed from our knowledge until we happen to look into them and see what they are, and then these gentlemen expect to carry on a political campaign by quoting from our own records that we are traitors to our country, traitors to God, and traitors to humanity. I think it is time that this miserable system of electioneering by violating the rules and courtesies of the Senate, to get an indorsement of libels, which men ought to be ashamed to adopt, should be exposed and rebuked. I am not willing that they should be permitted to pile up slander of that kind, insult of that kind, upon our table, and let it then be used for such a purpose. You know, sir, that that memorial is not intended to affect the action of the Senate. We have no such bill before us. Our action is passed. It is not for the purpose of influencing our official conduct. Why is it brought here? There can be no other object in presenting it here now than simply to furnish capital for organizing a great sectional party, and trying to draw the whole religious community into their schemes of political aggrandizement. I think that men ought to be able to rely upon argument, and upon truth, and upon reason, instead of resorting to these things for the purpose of stimulating excitement for political ends. I have no motion to submit, but I felt it to be my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the memorial.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think that a petition of this kind ought to be received, and that it is not subject to the charge brought against it by the Senator from Illinois. It does not arraign our action by being drawn up after that action was had. The Nebraska bill passed this body on the night of the 3d, or rather on the morning of the 4th instant. The memorial appears to be dated on the 1st of March. I cannot think that it meant any indignity to the Senate. There is nothing expressive of any such feeling in it. It is a right that all individuals in the community have, if their terms are respectful, to memorialize the Senate of the United States upon any subject. Whether there is any ulterior object in this I know not; but from the date of the memorial, and from the number of signers, I am induced to believe that the memorialists thought there was something wrong in that bill; and if they believed that its passage would be a breach of faith on the part of the Government, they had a right to say so. I took the liberty of making the same charge here. There were more questions than that of non-intervention involved in that bill. It involved an infraction of faith with the Indians, of pledges given to them under all the solemn forms, yet mockery, of treaties. That was one point involved; and I charged that the passage of the bill would be a violation of plighted faith in that particular. Was it a violation of faith to disregard the Missouri compromise, which was of so much antiquity and utility to the country? That is a matter of discussion. I have not arraigned the action of any gentleman since the passage of the bill, but anterior to it I gave my opinions in relation to its character, as a disregard of treaties, and as a flagrant violation of the plighted faith of the nation towards the Indians. With respect to the Missouri compromise I believe its repeal to be as flagrant a breach of faith as the violation of treaties made with the Indians.

I have not charged Senators with corrupt motives, nor have I charged them with anything selfish; but I certainly can see no more impropriety in ministers of the Gospel, in their vocation, memorializing Congress than politicians, or other individuals. I do not believe that these ministers have sent this memorial here to manufacture political capital, to have it entered on the records of the Senate, so that it might be taken back, and disseminated through the country. Sir, it comes from the country. I told you that there would be agitation; but it was denied upon this floor. Is not this agitation? Three thousand ministers of the living God upon earth—his vicegerents—send a memorial here upon this subject; and yet, you tell me, that there is no excitement in the country! Sir, you realize what I anticipated. The country has to bear the infliction.

Sir, the coup d'état was not successful. The bill did not pass before the community was awakened to it. The community was awakened to it not alone in New England, for I have seen letters from the South and West stating that it was there regarded as a breach of faith; and I can see no wrong in ministers expressing their opinion in regard to it. This protest does not attack the reputation of Senators. It does not displace them from their positions here. It does not impair their capabilities for the discharge of the high functions which the Constitution has devolved upon them. I see nothing wrong in all this. Ministers have a right to remonstrate. They are like other men. Because they are ministers of the Gospel they are not disfranchised of political rights and privileges; and, if their language is respectful to the Senate, in anticipation of the passage of a bill which was obnoxious to them, they have a right to spread their opinions on the records of the nation. The great national heart throbs under this measure; its pulse beats high; and is it surprising that we should observe the effects of it? I trust, sir, that the nation may yet again see the blessed tranquillity that prevailed over the whole country when this "healing measure" was introduced into the Senate. The nation's position was enviable. It was unagitated. There was not, in my recollection, a time so tranquil, and a community more happy. A nation more prosperous existed not upon the earth. Sir, I trust that there will be no continuance of agitation; but the way to end it is not to make war upon memorialists. Let them memorialize if they think it necessary. If they state what is incorrect, let the subject be referred to committees, and let the committees give an exposition of the truth, and lay it, in reports, before the public, and then the intelligence of the nation will determine as to what is right, and what consideration ought to be given to it. I would not take away the liberty to indulge in the freest expression of opinion, or the exercise of the rights and privileges which belong to any portion of this country; yet I would discourage agitation. I may hold the contents of this protest, to some extent, heretical; yet they are not expressed in such offensive language as would justify a denial of their right to memorialize. If it had been intended to impugn our motives or our actions, either as corrupt or immoral, we could bear it. The people surely have a right to think and speak upon our action. We are not placed in a position so high that we are elevated above the questioning power of the people. They have the right to look into our action, and investigate our conduct; and, if they do not approve of it, to express their opinions in relation to it. I shall never make war upon them on that account; yet, I trust, that, whatever disposition may be made of the bill which we have passed, the agitation has already reached its acme; and that, from this point it may decline, until the country is again restored to peace and happiness.

Mr. MASON. That it is the right of the citizens of the United States to petition Congress, or either House of it, upon any subject that may be presented to them, is never denied, never should be denied; and such petition upon any subject of public interest should be received and treated with the respect which is due to citizens. I trust I shall never see the day when the Senate of the United States will treat the authors of such petitions, upon any subject proper for legislation pending before the body, coming from the people of the United States with aught but respect. But I understand this petition to come from a class who have put aside their character of citizens. It comes from a class who style themselves in the petition ministers of the Gospel, and not citizens. They come before us—I have not understood the petition wrong, I believe—as ministers of the Gospel, not citizens, and denounce prospectively the action of the Senate, in their language, as a moral wrong; and they have the temerity, in the presence of the citizens of the United States, to invoke the vengeance of the Almighty, whom they profess to serve, against us. Sir, ministers of the Gospel are unknown to this Government, and God forbid the day should ever come when they shall be known to it. The great effort of the American people has been, by every form of defensive measures, to keep that class away from the Government; to deny to them any access to it as a class, or any interference in its proceedings. The best illustration of the wisdom of that policy is to be found in the character of this petition. Ministers of the Gospel, I repeat, are unknown to the Government. Their mission upon earth is unknown to the Government. Of all others, they are the most encroaching, and, as a body, arrogant class of men. What do these ministers say? Do they as citizens enter into a statement of the facts of which they complain? Do they recite what will be the political effects of the measure which they complain? No; they inform us that they come here, through their petition, in the presence of the Almighty, and invoke His vengeance upon the Senate of the United States as about to commit, in their judgment, a great moral wrong.

Now, sir, I am perfectly willing to let any number of citizens protest against the measure which has recently passed the Senate. They have a right to do so, in respectful language, such as becomes gentlemen in addressing each other. If thirty thousand, or three hundred thousand citizens come from New England, let them be heard. It is a respect due to them; but when they come here, not as citizens, but declaring that they come as ministers of the Gospel, and, as the honorable Senator from Texas declared them to be, vicegerents of the Almighty—so I understood him to declare, possibly he meant vice-regents to supervise and control the legislation of the country—I say, when they come here as a class unknown to the Government, a class that the Government does not mean to know in any form or shape, not to recommend or to remonstrate, but to denounce our action as a great moral wrong, because they claim to be the "vicegerents" of the Almighty, we are bound—not from disrespect to them as citizens, not from disrespect to the cloth which they do not grace, but from respect to the Government, from respect to that sacred public trust which has been committed to us—to carry out the policy of the Government and refuse to recognize them. Sir, their object, as was well said by the Senator from Illinois, has been agitation—agitation; and I presume that their cloth and their ministry will enable them to agitate with some success. I say, then, Mr. President, in my judgment it is due to the Government, to the public trust which we are here to administer, that we should carry out the policy of the Government and refuse to recognize these ministers of the Gospel in coming here. I move, therefore, that the petition be not received, as the best evidence of the sense of the Senate of its character.

Mr. BUTLER. It has been received, I believe, and all that is left is to protest against the protestants. I have great respect, Mr. President, for the pulpit. I have such a respect for it that I would almost submit to a rebuke from a minister of the Gospel, even in my official capacity; but they lose a portion of my respect when I see an organization, for, I believe, the first time in the history of this Government, of clergymen within a local precinct, within the limits of New England, assuming to be, as the Senator from Texas said, the vicegerents of Heaven, coming to the Senate of the United States, not as citizens, as my friend from Virginia has said, but as the organs of God—for they do not come here petitioning or presenting their views under the sanction of the obligations and responsibilities of citizens under the Constitution of the United States, but they have dared to quit the pulpit, and step into the political arena, and speak as the organs of Almighty God. Sir, they assume to be the foremen of the jury which is to pronounce the verdict and judgment of God upon earth. They do not protest as ordinary citizens do; but they mingle in their protest what they would have us believe is the judgment of the Almighty. When the clergy quit the province which is assigned to them, in which they can dispense the Gospel—that Gospel which is represented as the lamb, not as the tiger or the lion—when they would convert the lamb into the lion, going about in the form of agitators, seeking whom they may devour, instead of the meek and lowly representatives of Christ, they divest themselves of all respect which I can give them. Sir, the ministers of the Gospel are the representatives of the lowly and poor lamb—of Christ; but when the men who have signed that paper—I do not know with what ends; I do not say a word against them as individuals, for I have no doubt they are good and respectable, and many of them Christians—assume to organize themselves as clergymen to come before the country and protest against the deliberations of the Senate of the United States, they deserve, at least, the grave censure of the body.

Mr. ADAMS. During the discussion of the Nebraska bill before the Senate I did not open my mouth; nor should I now but for the remarks which have fallen from the distinguished Senator from Texas, my old and familiar friend. He says there is agitation, and that the display upon your table is evidence of it. Suppose there is agitation; at whose door ought the fault to lie, if there be fault? Was the action of this body right or wrong? If we did what was right and proper, according to the republican institutions of this country, and agitation arises out of it, the responsibility neither rests upon the distinguished Senator who introduced the bill nor those who voted for it. What was that action? This body, by its vote, removed a legislative censure upon the institutions of the South—a censure which has existed for more than thirty years, and under which we had lived submissively until now for the sake of peace. For the first time in thirty years when that censure could be repealed, when the southern States place themselves as the Constitution places them, upon an equality with the northern States, we are committing a very great outrage when we simply say that the people of every portion of this country within the limits of our constitutional authority shall be governed by their own laws in their own way. That is the whole of it.

I concur with my friend from South Carolina in regard to the petition which has been presented and ordered to lie on the table. It is addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives by a body of individuals as ministers of the Gospel. I trust I have as high a regard for their vocation as any other individual, and as much respect for the ministers of peace and good will on earth as any other individual; but when they depart from their high vocation, and come down to mingle in the turbid pools of politics, I would treat them just as I would all other citizens, I would treat their memorials and remonstrances precisely as I would those of other citizens. It is so unlike the apostles and the ministers of Christ at an early day, that it loses the potency which they suppose the styling themselves ministers of the Gospel would give to their memorials. The early ministers of Christ attended to their mission, one which was given to them by their Master; and under all circumstances, even when the Saviour himself was upon earth, and attempts were made to induce him to give opinions with reference to the municipal affairs of the Government, he refused. These men have descended from their high estate to assail the action of this body. The Senator from Massachusetts, in presenting the petition, has done what he considered to be his duty; but I would remark, however, that with all the respect which belongs to the high character of those individuals as ministers of the Gospel, their petition should, under the circumstances, receive no more respect from us than if it came from any other private citizens.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I have the misfortune again to differ from my friends in relation to this measure, but that difference is not sufficient to induce me to enter anew into the discussion of it. I will, however, discuss the propriety of this memorial. The gentlemen misapprehend its character entirely. I understood the honorable Senator from Virginia—but I may have been mistaken—to say that it invoked the vengeance of the Almighty God upon the Senate.

Mr. MASON. In substance it does, as I understand.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no invocation contained in the memorial. It is a respectful protest, stating their appreciation of the measure then pending before the Senate of the United States, and not one word is contained in it derogatory to the Senate at the time it was drawn, and there is no invocation of wrath or vengeance upon the members of this body. It is a respectful protest, in the name of the Almighty God.

By the expression which I used when I was up before, that they were the vicegerents of the Almighty, I merely intended to say that they were harbingers of peace to their fellow-men; and if it was a lapsus lingue, or improper expression, it does not change the intention that I then entertained in my mind, of expressing a belief, that it was nothing else than an extraordinary emergency that diverted men from their ordinary pursuits in the ministry of the Gospel to engage at all in, or to step even to the verge of, the political arena.

We are told, Mr. President, that this was intended for the purpose of agitation. It is certainly a manifestation of agitation; but it could not have been intended to create agitation, for the thing was done, and here is one of its developments and consequences. Yet, sir, I can see nothing wrong in the memorial, so far as I am concerned. If ministers of the Gospel are not recognized by the Constitution of the United States, they are recognized by the moral and social constitution of society. They are recognized in the constitution of man's salvation. The great Redeemer of the world enjoined duties upon mankind; and there is the moral constitution from which we have derived all the excellent principles of our political Constitution—the great principles upon which our Government, morally, socially, and religiously, is founded.

Then, sir, I do not think there is anything very derogatory to our institutions in the ministers of the Gospel expressing their opinions. They have a right to do it. No man can be a minister without first being a man. He has political rights; he has also the rights of a missionary of the Saviour, and he is not disfranchised by his vocation. Certain political restrictions may be laid upon him; he may be disqualified from serving in the Legislatures of the States, but that does not discharge him from political and civil obligations to his country. He has a right to contribute, as far as he thinks necessary, to the sustentation of its institutions. He has a right to interpose his voice as one of its citizens against the adoption of any measure which he believes will injure the nation. These individuals have done no more. They have not denounced the Senate, but they have protested, in the capacity of ministers, against what I and other Senators on this floor protested. They have the right to do it, and we cannot take that right from them. They will exercise it. The people have the right to think, and they will exercise that right. They have the right of memorializing, and they will exercise that right. They have the right to express their opinions, and they will exercise that right. They will exercise their rights in reprobation or commendation at the ballot-box, too; and preachers, I believe, vote. They have the right to do so. They are not very formidable numerically, but they have the right to do this as ministers of the Gospel, as well as we Senators have a right to vote for the adoption of a measure; and if it is not in accordance with their opinions they have a right to condemn it. They have the right to think it is morally wrong, politically wrong, civilly wrong, and socially wrong, if they do not interfere with the vested rights of others in the entertainment of those opinions.

I understood my honorable friend from Mississippi to say, that the South had been groaning for a long time under this oppressive measure. The South, sir, are a spirited people, and how they could have submitted for more than a third of a century to this indignity, this wrong, this act of oppression, which has ground them down in their prosperity and development, and never have said a word about it until this auspicious moment arrived, and that, too, when political subjects have been agitated at the North and South, that it should have been reserved for the action of the present Congress, after all others had glided by without complaint, rebuke, remonstrance, or suggestion of appeal, is a most extraordinary thing. My friend does not apprehend it; but there was no excitement out of this Capitol, or out of the city of Washington. It originated here. This was the grand laboratory of political action and political machinery. The object was to mature the measure here, and inflict it, by a coup d'état, upon the nation, and then radiate it to every point of the country. The potion does not react pleasantly. There is a response, but how does it go down? Not well. The physic works; it works badly; it works upward.

I am willing to receive any memorials that are presented to this body which are respectable in terms, whether they come from preachers, politicians, civilians, or from the beggars that congregate about your cities, and I will treat them with respect and kindness. As long as they are respectful in terms to this body, though they express their apprehension of a calamity about to fall on the country, it brands no man; and if they denounce a measure in advance, it is what they have a right to do. We have a more eligible position here to advocate our opinions than individuals have in social life to maintain their positions. We have all the panoply of power and State sovereignty thrown around the members of this body to guard and shield them against attacks; but they are thrown in the midst of the community without any shield, except it is the shield of morality and propriety of conduct which gives protection to their person. While they express themselves respectfully I shall never treat with disrespect preachers or any other individuals who come before this body to give us their opinions upon political subjects.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. President, as this memorial was presented by me, I think it my duty to say a few words to the Senate by way of explaining my relations to it. Just after the Senate came to order this morning, I was called from my seat to the door of the Senate Chamber, and there requested to take charge of it—this memorial. The gentleman in whose hands it was, with whom I had not the pleasure of a previous personal acquaintance, was introduced to me, as I have no doubt he is, as a most respectable member of the clerical profession; and I was requested by him to take charge of the memorial, and present it to the Senate. Seeing that it was a very voluminous document, and one which I could not carry with me to my seat, and there hand it, in the usual manner, to the attendants of the Senate, I directed one of them near me at the door to take it immediately to the table of the Secretary, so that I have had no opportunity whatever of inspecting it. I presented it to the Senate but a moment or two after it was placed in my charge, and, in point of fact, I had not read a word of it before I cast my eye over it and a few of the signatures at the head of it, in conjunction with the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, as we were standing together at the Secretary's table. I think it due to myself, as a matter of fact, that these circumstances should be stated, because the Senator from Illinois has objected to the language of the memorial, as disrespectful to the Senate, and as personally offensive to him, in common with the other members of the body who supported the bill. I am aware of the reserve which is imposed by the rules of the Senate on the presentation of memorials; and I deem it, therefore, no more than justice to myself that the Senate should understand precisely the circumstances under which this memorial was offered by me.

I think, however, sir, that I ought to go further, and, inasmuch as the time of its presentation is objected to, express, in justice to the memorialists, the opinion that this memorial was signed by probably every individual whose name is subscribed to it before the final action of the Senate on the Nebraska bill. It is probable, in collecting together the separated papers which had been circulated for signatures, and in preparing the memorial to be transmitted, in the copy of the caption which was made for that purpose, the date of the first of March was appended to it, without considering that many of the memorialists, probably all, must have signed it before that day. It ought not, therefore, to be considered, as has been complained of, as a protest directed against a measure which so large a majority of the Senate had previously sanctioned, but as the expression of the opinion entertained by those who signed it of a measure still pending before the Senate.

I do not undertake to vouch that this is the fact; but I presume that Senators will themselves, on reflection, consider that it must be so; and that the memorial must have been signed by a majority, if not by every individual whose name is there, while the measure was in its progress, and not after it had received the approbation of a great majority of this body.

My own opinion in relation to presenting memorials to the Senate in reference to measures that have passed from our control would be, that it is, generally speaking, not expedient. In a single instance of a memorial against the Nebraska bill, sent to me since the measure left this body, I have, at the suggestion of the person who sent it, instead of presenting it here, put it into the hands of the member of the other House who represents the district where the memorialists live. That was done at the request of the person who forwarded the memorial. Observing, however, that other Senators around me, in many cases, did present memorials which had reached them since the bill passed through the Senate, and contemplating the possibility that it might again come before us, after having undergone amendment in the other House, and that there was therefore still a propriety in its being considered, to a qualified extent, in our possession, I have thought there was no irregularity in that point of view, in presenting any memorial to which there was no objection on other grounds. On this principle I have acted in reference to several memorials against the Nebraska bill which have been sent to me during the past week.

In reference to the objections taken to the language of the memorial, and the concerted movement in which it has originated, I must say to the Senator from Illinois, that I do not believe there is anything in it intended for political effect. I have no belief that these three thousand clergymen from all parts of New England, in preparing and signing this memorial, have intended, in the smallest degree, to step from their sacred profession into the arena of party politics. I am confident it would be found, if it were possible to make the inquiry, that the memorial is signed by individuals of all political parties; that those who differ on every political question, in the common acceptance of the term, will be found to have united on this occasion; that this paper really expresses the sincere conviction of men who look at this subject strictly in a moral and religious aspect, and that, so far from desiring to take any part in the agitations that trouble the land, they have regarded the question solely in the other point of view in which it is natural it should present itself to their minds.

This has, from time immemorial, been the custom of the members of that profession, in that part of the country, although not confined to it. They have been in the habit, in reference to public questions which have strongly appealed to the sensibilities of the community, and which they regarded as having momentous moral and religious bearings, of expressing their opinions in this way; and I am quite sure, as I said before, that on this occasion, they have not intended to lay aside—they have not thought they were laying aside—their sacred character for the sake of joining in political agitation, or affecting the result of any political controversy. And, sir, I think I need not say, that a body of over three thousand clergymen, comprehending more than three fourths of the clerical profession of New England, of all denominations, is a very respectable body; that it must faithfully represent the public opinion of a very large and most intelligent portion of the community, and that it is entitled to the most respectful consideration on the part of this body. I do not wish, as a citizen myself of that part of the Union, to say anything that would be thought extravagant, or dictated by local partiality on that point, but I must say that I do not think it would be possible to find any body of men of the same number embracing a greater amount of personal and moral worth than these three thousand and fifty individuals. The greater portion of them are necessarily men of education. They are persons whose lives are consecrated, with very little reward in what are called this world's goods, to the highest objects to which the life and labors of a man can be devoted. Of course, in such a large number of men, there may be individual exceptions, but I do think that, in general, it may be very fairly said they are as exemplary, as intelligent, and as respectable a body of men as any other in the country, not to say in the world; and I must repeat my conviction, that on this occasion they were animated by no desire to embark in the strife and agitation of the world of politics; but that feeling they were performing a duty that devolved upon them, they have expressed their honest and sincere conviction of the character of the measure in question contemplated, in a moral and religious point of view.

I regret that the presentation of this memorial, which, under the circumstances, I could regard in no other light than as a duty to a large number of my own immediate constituents, should have awakened any feeling on the part of any member of the Senate. It is but three or four days since my friend from New York [Mr. Fish] presented a similar memorial—I mean similar in its object, for I have had no opportunity of comparing the terms in which it is couched—subscribed by almost every clergyman in the city of New York. It was headed by the distinguished bishop of the eastern diocese of that State; and it was represented to be signed by a large majority of the clergy of that city. No exception was taken in the Senate to that memorial; none to its terms; none to the facts of the presentation. It was received in the usual form, and ordered to lie upon the table in the usual manner. That, if I recollect right, was since the passage of the bill; and it took the course which other numerous memorials have taken which have also been presented since its passage. I think it would be wise and expedient that this memorial also should be received and disposed of in the usual way. I am quite sure that it would be doing injustice to the individuals who have signed it, many of whom are personally known to me, as men venerable for years, distinguished for learning, and of the utmost purity of life and character, to reject their memorial as having been prompted by any desire to kindle angry passions, or to engage in political controversy; but that we ought to give them the credit for having expressed honestly and sincerely the feelings and opinions which they entertained of this measure as a moral and religious question.

I do not know, sir, that I have anything more to say on this subject. I felt that it was due to the relation in which, without any previous intimation, I have been placed to the memorialists that I should say this much.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President, I am for the greatest liberty to the greatest number, and I will not deny to any class of my fellow-citizens, under whatever name or denomination they may appear, the right to petition; and under the general term "petition," provided for in the Constitution, I am willing to regard memorials and remonstrances, of whatever name, kind, or description, provided always they are respectful to the Senate. But they should be viewed in another light, and that is as to the propriety of time.

Then the first objection which I make to this remonstrance is not to its terms, not to it of itself, but to the time of its presentation. All memorializing and all petitioning is upon the basis or hypothesis that some good is to come of it; that there is something pending, or likely to be pending, to which it may refer. In that view, it is certainly too late now to present this memorial, though, as for that, I care but little. The bill has passed from us, never to return to us, in all probability. We have done our deed, for good or for evil, for weal or for woe. We are to have, I suppose, the righteous judgments of the country and of the Almighty upon us for the doing of that deed. I presume this memorial intends to convey the idea, although it does not say so distinctly, that we subject ourselves to the righteous judgments of the Almighty, to judgments which are terrible and fearful, judgments of torment, of pain, and of misery. I will not, however, so construe it, for my own gratification at least. I am willing to say that the righteous judgments of the Almighty held in reserve for us are those of approval and reward. I doubt not that we shall receive, through the country, through our fellow-citizens, that judgment of reward and approval. The bill, however, to which this remonstrance relates, has passed from us, not to return. It has gone entirely to the other House, and I can see no propriety in piling upon our table remonstrances against the passage of a measure which we have already passed.

But, sir, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ADAMS] says he has great respect and great reverence for the clergy, for the ministers of the Gospel, as such, while they keep their robes pure and unspotted; but when they descend to the turbid pools of politics, and bedabble their garments all over with the mud, and slime, and filth which he would make you believe is to be found there, he loses all respect for them. So should I, if I could be led to believe that the waters of the pool of politics were any more turbid or filthy than the waters which flow through their contradictory streams of theology. I do not believe it, sir. I hold, on the contrary, that the waters of the pools of politics are infinitely more pellucid, and pure, and cheering, and refreshing, than the pool which surrounds their stagnant waters of theology—no two of them agreeing on any proposition which can be presented.

I am, however, totally incompetent to judge of this matter. These men, as has been well said by the Senator from Virginia, have not come to you as fellow-citizens. The Constitution has secured to the citizens of the United States the right at all times to petition, and they shall never be denied that right by me, whether they choose to use the name of citizens or any other. But they have not remonstrated in their own name as citizens, nor in behalf of their fellow-citizens; but they have come, as they tell you, as the ambassadors of a higher and an omnipotent power. They use the language of an ambassador who says, "in the name of my Government I declare to you this, that, or the other." In the name of God, and in the name of his violated law, they declare this. They say that to them alone is given the power to divulge or to divine that law on earth. Sir, being totally incompetent, avowing here my total incapacity and inability to expound, divine, and illustrate that law, I shall leave it to a different forum and a different place.

These memorialists do not tell us that the measure against which they protest, will injure the country, or that it is a wrong to their fellow-citizens; but that it is a violation of the law of Him, their master, who, they claim, has sent them. The propriety of such a remonstrance may well be questioned; yet I will not undertake to question it.

Sir, this, then, is an ecclesiastical, not a political question. They have withdrawn it from the political arena. They have said that they are sent by the Divine Creator, the Maker and enforcer of divine law, commissioned to put forth and to thunder on our devoted heads his anathemas and his judgments in advance. As a secular body, we are entirely incompetent to judge of what that law is, or whether we have offended against it or not. These men say they are commissioned to expound it on earth to us. We have, however, provided ourselves for all these contingencies. When the people, in their political capacity, send their petitions or memorials here, they know we are competent to understand them, and to provide for their interests. But, sir, I suppose we have taken a step with a view of meeting the present condition of affairs. We have provided ourselves with a law officer of this law—an expounder of the divine law; a “brother” of the same class with those who now remonstrate; an officer of this body, who, from his age, his high standing, and many indorsements here, must be supposed to be as capable of expounding that law as any of these remonstrants. I think the fact that he has been selected by a body of such intelligence as the Senate, shows that he ought to be superior to any of them as an officer of that law which these men say we have violated and outraged. I will therefore suggest, at any rate, and I believe I shall propose, that this remonstrance be referred to the Rev. Henry Slicer, Chaplain of this Senate, for examination and report. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I want to know whether the officer of the Senate whom we have elected and appointed to expound the divine law and the divine will to us, will, not upon any oath of office, but upon his responsibility as an officer of this body, after calmly and deliberately weighing our actions here with the whole tendency, bearing, and spirit of the revealed will of God, say to us that we have so violated it. If he will, I believe I shall be ready to retract my vote on the bill, and agree to adopt his report, and go to my colleagues in the other House, and ask them for God's sake to send back the bill here, in order that we may retract our steps.

This, I repeat, is an ecclesiastical question. We are threatened with the anathemas, the thunders of the Almighty against us for violating his law. As a secular body here, we are no judges of that law; but we have provided ourselves with one who is a judge of it; and to him I think this whole matter ought to be referred. I think it will be no disrespect to the memorialists or the petitioners if we do so. They claim that they are gentlemen of the cloth, preachers of the Gospel. Now, we have elected one, and he is here, who is a gentleman of the cloth, and a minister of the Gospel of long experience; and I should be exceedingly glad to have his official report on this question, as to whether we are in danger, whether we have invoked the just and righteous judgments of God upon us. Therefore, if it is in order, I will move to refer the memorial to the Rev. Henry Slicer, the Chaplain of the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. So far as I am concerned, I am willing that the memorial shall be allowed to lie upon the table. The reason why I called attention to it at all was this: I have seen a deliberate attempt to organize the clergy of this country into a great political sectional party for Abolition schemes. That project was put forth clearly in the Abolition manifesto which I had to expose in my opening speech upon the Nebraska bill. This is a response to that Abolition manifesto. It is an attempt to give in the adhesion of the religious societies of this country through the clergy to the Abolition and political schemes of that organization. If these preachers choose to go into that political organization it is not for me to object, provided they confine their operations to the country, and do not send their insults here. I have no idea that these men would ever have dreamt of bringing forward such an objectionable document as this, but in response to that call which emanated from the Senate. It was by Senators in their official capacity as Senators, and these remonstrances have been sent back in response to the call.

Now, sir, what is this remonstrance? These men do not protest as citizens. They do not protest in the name either of themselves or of their fellow-citizens. They do not even protest in their own names as clergymen against this act, but they say that ‘WE PROTEST IN THE NAME OF ALMIGHTY GOD;’ and in order to make it more emphatic that they claim to speak by authority in their remonstrance, they underscore in broad black lines the words ‘IN THE NAME OF ALMIGHTY GOD.’ It is true they describe themselves as ministers of the Gospel, but they claim to speak in the name of the Almighty upon a political question pending in the Congress of the United States. It is an attempt to establish in this country the doctrine that a body of men organized and known among the people as clergymen have a peculiar right to determine the will of God in relation to legislative action. It is an attempt to establish a theocracy to take charge of our politics and our legislation. It is an attempt to make the legislative power of this country subordinate to the church. It is not only to unite church and State, but it is to put the State in subordination to the dictates of the church. Sir, you cannot find in the most despotic countries, in the darkest ages, a bolder attempt on the part of the ministers of the Gospel to usurp the power of Government, and to say to the people: “You must not think for yourselves; you must not dare to act for yourselves; you must in all matters pertaining to the affairs of this life, as well as the next, receive instructions from us; and that, too, in the performance of your civil and official, as well as your religious duties.”

Sir, I called attention to this matter for the purpose of showing that it involved a great principle subversive of our free institutions. If we recognize three thousand clergymen as having a higher right to interpret the will of God than we have, we destroy the right of self-action, of self-government, of self-thought, and we are merely to refer each of our political questions to this body of clergymen to inquire of them whether it is in conformity with the law of God and the will of the Almighty or not. This document, I repeat, purports to speak in the name of Almighty God, and then enters a protest in that name. We are put under the ban, we are excommunicated, the gates of Heaven are closed unless we obey this behest and stop in our course and carry out these Abolition views.

The Senator from Texas says the people have a right to petition. I do not question it. I do not wish to deprive ministers of the Gospel of that right. I do not acknowledge that there is any member of this body who has a higher respect and veneration either for a minister of the Gospel or for his holy calling than I have; but my respect is for him in his calling. I will not controvert what the Senator from Massachusetts has said as to there being, perhaps, no body of men in this country, three thousand in number, who combine more respectability than these clergymen. Probably they combine all the respectability which he claims for them; but I will add, that I doubt whether there is a body of men in America who combine so much profound ignorance on the question upon which they attempt to enlighten the Senate as this same body of preachers. How many of them, do you suppose, sir, have ever taken up and read the act of 1820 to which I allude? Do you think there is one of them who has done so? How many of them ever read the votes by which the North repudiated that act of 1820? Do you think one of them ever did? How many of them ever read the various votes which I quoted on that act and the Arkansas act? Do you think one of them knew anything about them? How many of them have ever traced the course of the compromise measures of 1850 on the record? One of them? Yet they assume, in the name of the Almighty, to judge of facts, and laws, and votes, of which they know nothing, and which they have no time to understand, if they perform their duties as clergymen to their respective flocks.

They do not pretend to judge from the knowledge of this world, from the records of the Senate, or from the statute-book, or from any of the sources of information on which Senators and citizens predicate their action; but by the will and the law of God, and in His name, and in consequence of their divine mission, they overrule all these and prescribe a new test, and, in that name, they tell us that by the passage of the bill which we have passed, we have committed a moral wrong. They tell us that it is subversive of all confidence in national engagements.

Now, let me ask, are these men particularly tenacious of national engagements? Did they in their pulpits, in 1850 and 1851, tell their followers that they were bound by their oaths, and by their religious duty, to surrender fugitive slaves in obedience to the Constitution? Did they then tell their people that they must perform national engagements? Did they then tell their flocks that the Senate was right in carrying out the provisions of the Constitution? Have they been particularly in the habit of enjoining in the pulpit and from the sacred desk, as a matter of conscience, that the people should perform the national engagements contained in the Constitution of our country, and which we are all sworn to support? Sir, I do not remember that any one of these three thousand preachers, at the time when in Boston and other points of this country there were attempts to resist the fugitive slave law by force, came forward and said it was a divine duty to perform national engagements. If they did, I have not seen the evidence of it. If they felt it was a matter of conscience and of duty on the part of the clergy to supervise the fulfillment of national engagements, to preserve the public faith, and the public honor, where were they then, when your Constitution was trampled upon, when oaths of office could not bind men to perform their constitutional duty, when public honor was being outraged? Where then, were these three thousand clergymen? We did not hear from them on that occasion. There was a national engagement which no man can deny; yet they did not raise their voices against its violation. But, in this case, merely because some Abolitionists from this body have said that an act of Congress constituted a national engagement, although the statement is contradicted by the record, they come forward at the bidding of an Abolition junta, to arraign the Senate of the United States in the name of the Almighty!

Sir, I deny their authority. I deny that they have any such commission from the Almighty to decide this question. I deny that our Constitution confers any such right upon them. I deny that the Bible confers any such right upon them. They can perform their duties within their sphere without my censure or my interference, and they are responsible to the Almighty for the manner in which they perform those duties; and I must be left to perform my duties within the sphere of my functions, with no other responsibility than to my constituents and to the Almighty, without the interference of those men. I do not acknowledge them as an intermediate tribunal. I do not acknowledge that they are, as the gentleman from Texas has called them, the vicegerents of the Almighty, and that they are to perform the duty of overlooking our conduct. I repudiate the whole doctrine as at war with the pure principles of Christianity, at war with the spirit of our institutions, at war with our Constitution, at war with every principle upon which a free Government can rest.

Then, sir, assuming this character, they come forward and tell us that the action of the Senate exposes us to the “righteous judgments of the Almighty.” Their leaders here try to avoid the force of the objection that this is offensive, upon the ground that the Senate had not voted upon the question at the time when the memorial was signed. However the fact may be as to the time of signing the protest, it cannot be denied that they sent it here for presentation by their own agent more than one week after the vote of the Senate had been published to the world. This excuse does not avail them, nor exculpate their conduct. It only furnishes evidence that their apologists here have become ashamed of their conduct. I wish it distinctly understood that I attach no blame to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT,] who presented this document, for his uniform conduct has proven him incapable of performing an improper act here knowingly. His explanation has set him right. But the fact still remains that this offensive protest has been sent here and presented to the Senate as an impeachment of our conduct in passing a bill which received the sanction of this body by a vote of 37 yeas to 14 nays.

But, passing that by, if it is not offensive to the Senate, because the Senate had not voted on the bill at the time, it was offensive to the Committee on Territories, who had reported it, and it is as much a violation of the rules of the Senate, of courtesy, and of decency, to bring in a document which is offensive to one of your committees, as to bring in one which is offensive to the body itself. Then that excuse will not avail.

Individually, I care nothing about this matter. To me it is a very small affair, compared with the sort of treatment which I am receiving every day. I submit to it with great composure. I wait for the coming of the day when the people will understand the real principle involved in the Nebraska bill. Sir, I hope to see the day arrive—surely it will arrive—when you will not be able to find a man in the United States who will acknowledge that he was ever opposed to that great principle of self-government, unless you can pin him by the record, and then he will have some excuse on some immaterial point. These confederates can have their triumph now, by heaping on our heads insult and calumny, and by deceiving even ministers of the Gospel and members of churches into acts of excess which are disgraceful to them, and of which they will be ashamed when the question comes to be fairly understood.

And, sir, when that revolution comes, when that revulsion of feeling, from an indignant people who have been misled under holy pretenses for base partisan purposes, returns upon them, I then will be able to say, "Now you get the reward of your own conduct." I bide my time; I take no exception to what is going on now; but I wish to enter my protest against the Senate giving its sanction to the recognition of the clergy of this country as a body of men authorized to judge upon political and legislative questions in the name of the Almighty, and without any responsibility to the people. It reverses the whole principle of our Government, and it was only to enter my protest against that reversal that I called the attention of the Senate to this protest.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, as the honorable Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Territories, seemed in a most emphatic manner to address his remarks to me, I think him fully entitled to the respect of my attention. He has dwelt upon the Abolition character of this document. So far as any such character may be embodied in it, I have nothing to say. There are various opinions entertained here and elsewhere upon various subjects with which I have nothing to do, and with which I have no affiliation; but with this subject, as it is presented to the Senate now, I have some connection. With the controversy which exists between the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CHASE,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] I have nothing to do. I was not here when the controversy originated, nor when it was first introduced into the Senate. I have not participated in it since; and however unpleasant such altercations or controversies may be, and however I may regard them as impeding the transaction of business in this body, I have forbore either public or private expressions of opinion upon that matter.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the only allusion which I had to him was the simple quotation which I made from his remarks when he spoke of these ministers being the vicegerents of the Almighty. My other remarks were intended for another quarter, so far as they had an application anywhere. If he is under the misapprehension of supposing that they referred to him, I wish to correct him; that is all. I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am very glad to hear the disclaimer, for the gentleman's remarks appeared to be directed so unequivocally toward me, that I was led into the misapprehension of supposing that they were intended perhaps to apply to me, in a manner in which it was not the purpose of the gentleman to apply them. But, sir, I explained when I was up before the misapplication of the term "vicegerent," and I expressed my opinion to be that the ministers of the Gospel were the heralds of the Almighty God, or his ministers of peace upon earth. I thought the gentleman would not have carped upon that expression, unless with reference to some particular influence which my views might have upon the auditory. It was a mere misapplication of a term, and I so explained it.

But, Mr. President, I think the object of this memorial is misapprehended. I find no fault with its introduction either before or after the passage of the bill to which it refers, for that bill may be returned to the Senate with amendments. Such things very frequently occur. At all events, as the memorial has been prepared with great care, and as the gentlemen who have signed it have been anxious that their views should be laid before the Senate of the United States, lest other measures embracing similar principles should be introduced, I can see nothing improper in allowing them to lay their views respectfully before the Senate. I do not think there is any evidence that the gentlemen who have signed the memorial have any disposition to establish theocracy in our country, or that they wish to take the Government into their own hands, and exercise a controlling influence over it. We find that those who have signed this document are of different sects and of various denominations. I think there is no danger that such an amalgamation of interests and opinions will take place as to embody a force sufficient to make any great impression on the institutions of this country, or to endanger our liberties.

Mr. President, this memorial is regarded as a substantive and independent matter, as intended to produce agitation, and to insult the Senate; but it is really the effect of a measure which I predicted would have this influence upon the community. The cause exists in the Senate. It exists in the amendment inserted into the Nebraska bill proposing the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and this is but responsive action to that. The cause is not in the clergymen who have signed this memorial. The memorial is the effect of a cause brought forward and presented in the Senate. The memorial impugns the action of no one. It is true the memorialists speak of the measure as immoral. Surely that ought not to insult Senators. They are not such paragons of morality that they cannot bear to have their moral character questioned, if they should happen to do anything which would not be strictly moral, according to some standards, but which I should not think to be very immoral. But is their morality of such a delicate texture as to be affected by a memorial coming from "the land of steady habits?"

We are told that there is a great principle involved in the bill to which this memorial refers. This is a very formidable and very visible response to that great principle which it is said has lain dormant. Sir, I need not name the number of years that it has lain dormant. No bright genius ever elicited it; no brilliant conception ever discovered it until this session had progressed for some time, when the great principle of non-intervention at once sprang up to illumine the world, to be regarded as one which, at some future day, would be a universally-recognized principle. Sir, I recognize the principles of self-government, but I do it in sovereignty. A people in tutelage cannot exercise sovereignty, but States can. A people who are in a territorial existence, which is fitting them to become States, exercise what may be called a quasi sovereignty. They are never really sovereign until they are recognized by Congress as such, and are received into the Union as sovereign States. Then is the time for the operation of self-government, but it grows out of sovereignty. Is it to be in five squatters? They may pass a law to-day and repeal it to-morrow, and the next day they may pass another law, and so on successively from day to day, and from year to year they may pass and repeal laws. The Territories have no power to pass organic laws until the attributes of sovereignty are about to attach, or have actually attached to them. That is what I call non-intervention. That is what I call sovereignty and self-government.

This is the great principle which it is said is involved in the bill which we have passed; and now we are receiving the response to it. I hope we may never have any more responses of this description. I pray Heaven that we may never have another such protest in this body. I pray that there may never exist any necessity for it. But for the necessity or cause, which originated in this body, this memorial would never have been laid upon your table. This is but the effect; the cause was anterior to it. If we wish to avert calamitous effects, we should prevent pernicious causes.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I do not intend to be drawn, by any remarks which have been made, into a discussion of the question which was so elaborately discussed and finally disposed of, so far as this House is concerned, the week before last; but I have a few words to say upon the mere incident, the circumstance which, happening here this morning, is the subject of discussion.

I understand that the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] who moved that this petition should not be received, submitted that motion after the petition, in fact, had been received; and therefore I suppose that motion is not in order, and will not be insisted upon. I do not understand the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. PETTIT] seriously to propose to refer to the Chaplain of the Senate a paper addressed to the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. PETTIT. If our rules allow it I shall insist on that reference.

Mr. SEWARD. I understand the honorable Senator to assume that the rules do not allow it, and that it therefore cannot be done. Hence I will address no remarks to the Senate on that point. I understand the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] who objected to this memorial, to say that, after having delivered his sentiments on the subject of the measure to which it referred, he, for one, would consent that the memorial should lie on the table. That is precisely what is desired by the petitioners themselves, or those who represent them here on this occasion. I understand, therefore, that there is no legislative question before the Senate at all in regard to this matter; but that practically we are all agreed that this memorial or petition, respectful or otherwise, right or wrong, shall lie on the table. Then I understand the design of the honorable Senator from Illinois, and of those who have addressed the Senate upon this occasion, has been to reply to the remarks which are contained in the memorial upon the subject of the Nebraska bill, and the abrogation of the Missouri compromise. Though I do not think this is a customary or a right way to meet memorials or remonstrances from the people, yet, inasmuch as several Senators from different parts of the country have thought it proper to reply, by the expression of their opinions and sentiments, upon the propriety of this memorial, and the propriety of those who have sent it here, I barely wish to state for myself what I think on the subject.

Now, Mr. President, I have to say, in the first place, that, if the presentation of this memorial here is wrong at all, it is wrong either in regard to the time, or the place, or the circumstance, or the character of the memorialists, or the argument which the memorial makes.

Well, sir, I think those who will reflect on the subject will see that there is no censure justly to be cast upon the memorialists in regard to the time. It has been the habitual practice of the Senate to receive memorials and petitions upon subjects which were not yet before the body for action, and might never be; as, for instance, memorials upon the subject of securing the liberty of conscience to American citizens in foreign countries, have been received without question. So in regard to this matter. It is a subject which is one of legitimate consideration for the Senate. Although the Senate have acted on it, their action is as yet inchoate; it is liable to be reviewed directly. When the bill shall pass the other House, if ever, it may and probably will come back to us with amendments. Even if this were not so, still the Senate might be convinced, by the arguments of the memorialists or otherwise, that they had acted unwisely and injuriously to the country. If so, it is not too late to rescind our action. We can take measures to repeal the act if it shall ever pass.

Then, sir, in regard to the character of the persons who have presented this memorial; is there anything wrong in that? It is said they are clergymen, but they are nevertheless American citizens, and the broader qualification of citizenship covers over the lesser and inferior character and description of clergymen. Every man who is a citizen of the United States, and, according to my theory, every man who, although he may not be a citizen yet is a subject of the Government of the United States, has a right to petition the Congress of the United States upon any subject of national interest, or which can be legitimately the subject of legislation. Then, is there any well-grounded objection to the fact that they describe themselves as clergymen? Certainly not; because it is the right and the privilege of a citizen, if he can petition at all, to present his petition in his own way. If he thinks there is anything in his character or position which entitles his opinions to higher consideration, or which leads to the belief that he understands the subject more thoroughly than others, it is his right to describe himself by the appellation which designates his profession, his character, or his office. It is only on this principle that the Legislatures of the States make their voices known to Congress, by describing themselves as the Legislatures of the States. After all, they come here with their resolutions in the character of petitioners or remonstrants, under that provision of the Constitution which guaranties the right of petition, and upon no other ground of constitutional right whatever.

Is there, then, any well-grounded objection to the language or tone of this memorial? I think not. While, on the other hand, it is such a memorial as a secular person like myself would not be apt to dictate or sign, because there is a solemnity of tone, a seriousness, and religious consideration which secular men do not indulge or affect; yet, on the other hand, it is professional, and natural on the part of the memorialists; it is in the character of those who make it. It is said, indeed, that they assume to speak the will, and judgment, and pleasure of the Creator, and judge of men and nations. I do not understand them as assuming to speak any such thing. I understand them as saying simply, in substance, "We, citizens of the United States, subscribing ourselves as clergymen in the presence of Almighty God, and in His name address the Congress of the United States." Sir, what is unusual or wrong in this? You do not commence your proceedings here on any day of your whole session without acknowledging and declaring that they are begun in the presence, and in the name, and with an invocation of the blessing of Almighty God.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. SEWARD. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will look at the memorial, he will find that the signers carefully exclude their character of citizens. They speak of themselves as clergymen of the United States in the name of Almighty God, and in his presence making this protest before the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. I may agree with the honorable Senator as to the fact that they do not state their citizenship, or their character as citizens; but I believe there is no dispute of the fact that they are citizens of the United States.

Mr. MASON. Non constat.

Mr. SEWARD. I say that is so. It is practically known to us that the clergy of this country are persons who are invested with the rights of citizens. I have said, sir, that they come here declaring that they come in the presence of Almighty God. It is that universal and eternal presence in which we all are every day and hour of our lives, and from which we can never for even a moment escape.

Again, sir, it is objected that they say they address us in the name of Almighty God. What is that but a mode of arresting or calling attention to their solemn prayer and earnest remonstrance? Sir, while there are occasions on which we never forget, never suffer ourselves to forget that we are responsible to Almighty God, it is equally true that all our action is, or ought to be, in the name of the Supreme Being. Sir, we may put off, we may lay aside the thoughts of that awful presence during our secular labors and during our life of confusion and toil and turmoil and care; but when we come to close our eyes upon this world, we cannot shut them without the reflection that we are ever here in the sight of the Judge of all men. Every man of us, when he comes to write his opinion, or his will, or his instructions for those who are to come after him, recites that it is done in the name of God. Sir, as I have said, I should not adopt this mode of addressing the Senate or Congress. It is not my habit to do so; but I know that it is the habit, that it is in the character, in the way of those who have signed this memorial. I see no ground of objection to it. Is it disrespectful to the Senate of the United States, or to Congress, that men should say they speak to them in the name of God, and in his presence? If it be so, it must be because we claim to be here exempt from the superintending government and providence of that Being, in whom and by whom we live and walk, and through whom we exist upon the earth.

But, sir, it is said that at the close of this remonstrance, there is another remark which is offensive, and that is, that the memorialists think the measure against which they protest is immoral in its nature, and that among its consequences it will draw down upon us—not upon this Senate, but upon the nation, upon this people—the judgments of Almighty God. Sir, the question in the great measure proposed is either moral or immoral. There is no neutrality between morality and immorality. It may be that we may conscientiously differ in ascertaining which is the moral side, but nevertheless it is of one character or the other—either moral or immoral. These persons tell us they think it is of one character, others think it is of another character. It is our right to act. Let them think what they will, it is their right to tell us that, in their opinion, it is either one thing or the other, just as they understand and believe.

Then, again, it is said that the memorialists allege that the act will draw after it the judgments of Almighty God. Sir, by the judgments of Almighty God, I understand simply this: that every human act of any importance or magnitude is connected with preceding causes, and with subsequent effects; that there is connected with a right act the consequence of usefulness, of beneficence, of happiness, and all the blessings of a just Ruler; and that, on the other hand, to those acts which, whether we deem them moral or immoral, whether intentionally wrong or not, are unwise, there are connected consequences of error, danger, peril, unhappiness, wretchedness, ruin. This, in my judgment, is all that that expression means.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to bring one thing to the view of the honorable Senator, if he will allow me. I wish to ask whether it is his opinion, from an inspection of the paper, that the clergymen who signed it had the memorial before them at the time when they signed it? It purports to have been signed on the first of March, and the bill passed the Senate on the third of March. Will he tell me whether they did or did not sign their names blindly, without seeing the memorial?

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator will excuse me from answering his question; for I have not gone nearer to the paper to look at it than I am now when I stand at my desk.

Mr. BUTLER. I venture to say they never saw the memorial. They could not have done it.

Mr. SEWARD. I was simply saying that these persons, being clergymen, being devoted to the worship of God and the cure of souls, have a language of their own, and that in this language they have expressed and embodied their opinions on a secular question, and that in it there is nothing which, by just construction, ought to give offense.

And now, sir, I come to the close of what I have to say on this whole matter; and that is, that I regard this as a question of no idle importance. The right of petition is a constitutional right, and a useful and invaluable one, and I shall never be found criticising the language of petitioners or remonstrants to see whether I cannot find cause for cavil or for rejection. The petitioners and remonstrants may say precisely what they please, and precisely what they think, in whatever tone or language they think proper. They may use, for me, any epithet which they please. They may invoke on my head any judgment they please. Still, sir, with a conscience void of offense against God and man, I can go on here performing my duties, leaving them in the enjoyment of their rights, and listening to all that they say, precisely as if it had been rendered into the language of courtesy, or compliment, or of praise, which would be acceptable under other circumstances. It is because I wish that this right of petition may take no injury from the debate of this morning that I have risen to vindicate the memorial, and to do justice to those from whom it has come.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I think we have given rather more importance to the memorial than its intrinsic merits entitle it to. I have no doubt at all that what is said by my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] is strictly true, that the gentlemen who have signed this paper belong to a class of highly respectable and excellent men. I would say, probably, with regard to each of them, what Sir Walter Scott, in one of his novels, makes Cromwell say in regard to the Reverend Mr. Oldenough: "Lack-a-day, lack-a-day, a learned man, but intemperate; over-zeal hath eaten him up."

These gentlemen do not come here in the character of petitioners. These gentlemen do not come here in the character of remonstrants. They do not come here in the character of memorialists; but they come as protestors, not in their own name, not with the individual weight and authority which might be attributed to their protest on the ground of their own intelligence or worth, not merely with the weight and authority which might be superadded to this and other considerations from the fact of their being ministers of the Gospel.

It is impossible to look at this paper without seeing that the honorable Senator from New York has specially pleaded upon the subject, and that the reverend gentlemen who signed it will not thank him for assigning them in this paper the low position in which he wishes to place them. What is it?

"The undersigned clergymen of different religious denominations in New England, hereby, in the name of Almighty God, solemnly protest."

In their official characters as ministers of Almighty God, and in his name, they protest against the passage of the Nebraska bill.

Now, sir, these are educated gentlemen. They are men of experience in their vocation. They understand the true and solemn import of the words here used; and I have not the shadow of a doubt that they meant to enter a protest, as the language imports, as a protest, through them, of the Almighty God himself speaking to this Senate. It is not an expression preparatory to a solemn act to be done by them; for all that is completed when they declare that they speak in the presence of God—that is to say, with a solemn recollection of His presence, realizing His superintendence over what they are doing. What, then, do they mean, when they add that they speak in His name, unless it is that they speak by His authority? That can admit of no doubt.

Well, then, sir, the whole paper proceeds in the same name and by the same authority; and, among other things, they protest against the measure as a great moral wrong, a breach of faith eminently injurious to the moral principles of the community, subversive of all confidence in national engagements, and as exposing us to the righteous judgments of the Almighty. All that is announced by these gentlemen, as ministers of God, affecting to speak in His name.

The interpretation of the paper, sir, I think it is impossible to mistake; but I have said that I think too much importance, decidedly too much importance, has been attached to it. Whether this is to be understood as a denunciation of the judgments of God, or as a prediction of his judgments, I deny the authority to denounce, and I deny the gift of prophecy, and, therefore, I think we need not have troubled ourselves further on the subject.

Each of these reverend gentlemen being in the habit, in his vocation and in his particular department, of ruling and governing his congregation, gets habitually, of course, the habit of speaking on all occasions with authority. I believe that they meant it as speaking by authority. I believe they thought they had authority for what they said, and that there was nothing improper in extending that authoritative style of speaking, in the name of the Master whose ministers they are, to the Senate, as they are in the habit of doing in their ordinary ministrations to the congregations who acknowledge them as pastors. But why should that disturb us? Who cares for it? Does anybody believe they have power to hurl the thunder bolts of heaven? Does any man believe that they are gifted with the spirit of prophecy, and able to announce to us what, in the future course of things, will come to pass? Not at all. I dare say they are very good men, but, like the Reverend Mr. Oldenough, over zealous; and there, for one, I am willing to leave the subject. I move, then, that the memorial lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPER WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Richard B. Carmichael, in behalf of the estate of Alphonsa J. A. Blake, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

DEEPENING OF THE PATAPSCO.

Mr. PEARCE. I desire to present resolutions of the City Council of Baltimore, urging an appropriation for deepening the channel of the Patapsco river and Chesapeake Bay. They give various reasons which show the absolute necessity for such an appropriation. The object is one which is demanded by what is due to the present population and business of the city of Baltimore—to its important export and coasting trade. Its necessity is increased by the communications from that city by railroads to the great West, and also by the consideration that Baltimore is the depot of an unlimited amount of bituminous coal, which can be furnished to our steam and commercial marine. There is, therefore, a necessity for having access to the city for the largest class of vessels. The channel of the river is now so obstructed as to render it impossible for such vessels to enter. Those obstructions might be very readily removed. The subject, I repeat, is one of great importance, and commends itself to the attention of the Committee on Commerce, to which, I suppose, the resolutions should be referred. I move their reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. In connection with the same subject, I beg leave to present the memorial of the Board of Trade of Baltimore, asking an appropriation of a similar amount of money for the improvement of the Patapsco river and Chesapeake Bay.

This memorial, Mr. President, presents some facts which I would like to bring to the special attention of the Senate. In the first place, there is one point which has been suggested by my colleague, that at this time the city of Baltimore is the only port in the Union at which a plentiful and cheap supply of bituminous coal can be furnished to our marine. The memorial also states the fact that between the capes of the Chesapeake and Pensacola there is now no southern port in which, in the event of a war, one of our larger class naval vessels could enter for any purpose. It also refers to the probability of a war in Europe, and the possibility, at least, of our being drawn into that war—a possibility which, I think, is increased by developments since the memorial was signed and sent to me.

It appears to me, Mr. President, that the subject is one of deep interest in every aspect. That there should be ports, southern ports, in which our vessels of war could enter for purposes of repair and supplies, and safety, is manifestly necessary to the interest and welfare of the country, I had hoped that my colleague would have made a motion (instead of referring the resolutions which he presented to the Committee on Commerce) to refer them to a select committee. I believe that the Committee on Commerce are already charged with various applications for appropriations for the improvement of harbors from every section of the country; and that their purpose is to embody in a general bill all the measures that they may think worthy of the consideration of the Senate. Now, however, in the present aspect of affairs, this is an object of interest beyond any which has yet been presented to the consideration of the Senate upon this subject; and I think that it should not be connected with the others, but that we should have the opportunity of having a report from a committee, and a special bill making the appropriation. I will, with the concurrence of my colleague, move that the memorial be referred to a select committee.

One other fact may be referred to, which is a matter in which the whole southwestern part of our country is deeply interested. I find upon my table this morning a memorial asking for some millions of acres of land to aid in the construction of the Marietta and Cincinnati railroad, which is to connect with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad at Wheeling. From your own great city, sir, we have appropriated millions of acres of land for the purpose of making a similar connection; and it is apparent, that unless this harbor of Baltimore is made accessible to the larger class of vessels, all these various appropriations will be comparatively of no use. I hope that the Senate will, if my colleague will consent, allow this memorial to be referred to a select committee, and have a bill reported, so that the sense of the Senate may be had upon this isolated question, whether this southern harbor shall be so improved as to admit vessels of the largest class.

Mr. PEARCE. The resolutions which I presented have been referred to the Committee on Commerce; but I certainly concur with my colleague in his request to refer his memorial to a select committee.

Mr. PRATT. That is what I ask.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator moves that the memorial be referred to a select committee of five.

Mr. WALKER. The Committee on Commerce, as I understand, has the subject now under consideration. That being the case, I should prefer that the same committee should have this memorial sent to them. I have no doubt that they can see the necessity for this matter, and give it as careful an attention and consideration as a select committee. I hope, therefore, that the memorial will go to that committee.

Mr. ADAMS. I dislike to object to the wishes of the Senators; but unless some good reason can be shown why the Committee on Commerce, to whom this subject properly belongs, as is admitted, is prejudiced some way, or incompetent to consider this matter; unless some good reason can be given, over and above the fact that that committee have the whole subject of internal improvement under their consideration—which is an argument in favor of the reference of this memorial to them—I concur with the Senator from Wisconsin that a special committee ought not to be raised.

Mr. PRATT. I thought I had stated several reasons why this memorial should go to a select committee. I cannot see for my life why it should go to the Committee on Commerce. The reason why I advocate the appropriation of money for this object by the Federal Government, is, that it is essential to our Navy that we should have access to the city of Baltimore, as the only port at which you can get the necessary supply of bituminous coal for the steam marine. That is the ground on which I put it. If it is to go to any of the standing committees of the Senate, it should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and not to the Committee on Commerce.

I stated, further, that this was a question, certainly, in the present aspect of our foreign relations, of deep importance to the country; that there should be some improvement made in this as well as some other southern harbors, so as to enable our vessels of war to have access to them in the event of a conflict with an enemy. I hope that my honorable friend from Mississippi will concur with me that this should go to a select committee. Let a bill be reported, and then let the argument be offered on the policy of making an appropriation. Then we can decide as we think proper on that question.

The motion to refer to a select committee was agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the committee be appointed by the President.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented a memorial of citizens of Clinton county, Iowa, praying that a donation of land be made to aid in the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a petition of citizens of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, praying that a grant of land may be made to aid in the construction of the Iowa Central Air-Line Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MASON presented additional evidence in relation to the claim of Virginia for money advanced the General Government for the erection of public buildings; which, with the papers already on file in relation to the subject, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. FITZPATRICK, it was Ordered, That John C. Whitsett have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the messages of the President, and the report of the Secretary of the Interior yesterday communicated to the Senate, be printed.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Anne W. Angus, widow of Samuel Angus, late captain in the United States Army, praying a continuance of pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Andrew J. Dickert, a soldier during the war with Mexico, praying a pension on account of disease contracted in the service, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Anne Royal, praying a pension, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the petition lie on the table; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the memorial of Mary Baury, widow of Louis Baury, an officer in the revolutionary war, and the memorial of John Boykin, praying pensions, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Henry La Reintrie, praying compensation for services as secretary and interpreter to the United States Legation to Chili, and for services as bearer of dispatches, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of Theresa Dardenne, widow of Abraham Dardenne, praying Congress to indemnify her for losses sustained on account of an erroneous sale of land made to Abraham Dardenne by the land officers of Little Rock, Arkansas, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read, and passed to second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Andrew Hodge, junior, praying the enactment of a law authorizing such an arrangement with him, as one of the sureties of William H. Kerr, late postmaster at New Orleans, as will, while it protects the Government from total loss, save him from ruin, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Levi Pierce and Andrew Hodge, junior; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and accompanying documents of Hezekiah Miller, of the District of Columbia, praying for arrears of pay due him as a clerk in the War Department for the discharge of certain duties, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the memorial and accompanying documents of Amos Kendall and John E. Kendall, praying that provision may be made for securing the payment of their claim against the Western Cherokee Indians, out of the money due by the United States to those Indians, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

SENATE DEBATES.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a letter of Robert Armstrong, desiring to surrender his contract for publishing the debates of the Senate, a letter from Beverly Tucker proposing to assume that contract, and a letter from A. O. P. Nicholson proposing to continue the contract, have directed me to report that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the whole matter. I ask, however, that the report may lie on the table, as there is before the Senate a proposition to purchase an additional number of the Congressional Globe and Appendix; and the matter should all be considered at the same time.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

POST ROAD.

Mr. JOHNSON offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of creating a post route from Searcy, in White county, via Quitman, to Clinton, in Van Buren county, Arkansas.

GULF OF MEXICO.

Mr. SLIDELL offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be requested, to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriations sufficient to mark out and designate, by proper buoys, beacons, &c., the channels through Atchafalaya, Cote Blanc, and Vermilion bays, and to place buoys therein wherever needed; also for the erection of a light house on Racoon Point, being the western extremity of Lost Island, or Ship

Island, as it is called on the marine chart of the coast in the parish of Terrebonne, Louisiana; also, for the erection of a light-house at or near Proctorville, in the parish of St. Bernard, Louisiana; also, to inquire into the expediency of removing the office of the custom-house of the district of Poche, from the town of Franklin, in the parish of St. Mary's, to the town of Pattersonville, in the same parish.

FORTIFICATION AT PROCTORVILLE.

Mr. SLIDELL offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the construction of a fortification at or near Proctorville, in the parish of St. Bernard, Louisiana.

CALIFORNIA LAND TITLES.

Mr. GWIN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its consideration now:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be directed to have translated the decrees and other acts of the Mexican Government appertaining to land titles in the State of California, now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States.

I will state, in a word, that the Supreme Court will meet on the first Monday in April for the purpose of taking up these cases. These translations are indispensably necessary for the cases to be considered then. I therefore hope the resolution will be acted on now.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

MARTIN KOSZTA.

Mr. BELL. I wish to offer a resolution to which I hope there will be no objection. It is to call for supplementary information upon a subject which has already received the attention of the Senate. The correspondence between the American legation at Constantinople and this Government has already been called for and communicated; and now, in order to complete the information, I offer the following resolution; and ask for its consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if, in his judgment, not incompatible with the public interest, copies of correspondence between the American Consul at Smyrna and the American Legation at Constantinople, and also between the said Consul and this Government, on the subject of the seizure of Martin Koszta by the Austrian authorities.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

DEEPENING OF THE PATAPSCO.

Mr. PEARCE. I present resolutions of the City Councils of Baltimore, urging an appropriation for deepening the channel of the Patapsco river and the Chesapeake Bay. Various considerations have been relied upon to show the propriety of the appropriation asked. It is believed to be demanded by what is due to the present population and business of Baltimore, the importance and extent of its export and coasting, and the large and speedy increase of that trade which is rendered certain by the completion of railroad communications leading from the city to the great rivers of the West. It is also urged by the consideration that Baltimore is the depot of an unlimited supply of the best bituminous coal which can be furnished to our naval and commercial steam marine. This makes it desirable that ships of the largest class should have access to the port. At present the channel is obstructed by knolls which might easily be removed; and when removed, would not form again. In some places the channel has a depth at low water of only sixteen feet, which hinders the access of naval steamers and the largest class of vessels engaged in commerce. The subject is one of importance; the improvement asked for is national in its character, and commends itself to the attention of the Committee on Commerce, to which such subjects are usually referred.

I move the reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed, as the Select Committee, Mr. PRATT, Mr. BRODHEAD, Mr. CHASE, Mr. CLAYTON, and Mr. RUSK.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. EVERETT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be directed to inquire into the expediency of revising the laws relative to the distribution of the public documents printed by order of Congress, and of making further provision for their preservation.

PACIFIC RAILROAD SURVEYS.

Mr. WELLER. I offer a resolution, which I ask may now be considered:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of Lieutenant Williamson's report of his surveys to ascertain a practical route for a railroad to the Pacific ocean, dated January 12, 1854.

Mr. RUSK. I think the resolution had better be so amended as to embrace all the additional information. My own impression is, that perhaps the resolution should lie over for a few days. There are portions of the other surveying parties who will probably complete their work in a very few days, and we shall then be able to get all the information; and I think it would be better to have it in one volume. I have, however, no objection to this resolution, though I think it would be more convenient to have all the information in one document; which could be easily examined. If the Senator desires to have this report, I hope his resolution will be so amended as to call for all the information.

Mr. WELLER. I offered this resolution at the request of my colleague, who has been temporarily called out of the Chamber. I do not know what reports have been made to the Department on this subject; but, as a matter of course, I wish to have all the reports which may now be in the Department printed, as this is becoming a practical subject, and one on which we shall very soon be called upon to pass. If there be any other reports from the engineer corps who have been sent on these surveying expeditions, I desire to obtain them; and I have no objection to such a modification of the resolution as will call for all the information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ADAMS in the chair.) Does the Chair understand the Senator from Texas as moving to amend the resolution?

Mr. RUSK. The suggestion which I made was, that the resolution, perhaps, had better lie over until the other surveying parties shall report, so that we can have all the information upon the subject in one document.

Mr. GWIN. I can state to the Senator that the report which the resolution calls for is one which is now lying in the Department, and I was requested to introduce a resolution calling for it, in order that it might be printed. All the others have been sent in, and this is the only one left there. As the reports come in, they can be called for, and be printed. There may be some important information in this report; and I believe the Senator would think so if he saw it.

Mr. RUSK. I have no objection to the resolution. My only desire is that we should have all these reports in one document.

The resolution was adopted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ADAMS.) The special order is the resolution of the Committee on the Judiciary in relation to the right of the Hon. S. S. PHELPS to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that, at this late hour, the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. FOOT,] who is entitled to the floor on that question, does not desire to proceed, and I think it would be hardly just to that Senator to ask him to proceed to-day. I move, therefore, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of Executive business, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 14, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is on the motion to commit the joint resolution explanatory of the law regulating the number of military cadets to be appointed to the Military Academy at West Point.

REPEAL OF THE MISSOURI COMPROMISE.

Mr. APPLETON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a protest of the clergy of different denominations in New England against the repeal of the Missouri compromise in the bill for the organization of the Nebraska and Kansas Territories.

The protest is engrossed on parchment, and bears date, Boston, 1st March, 1854. It contains upwards of three thousand signatures, which occupy two hundred and fifty feet of paper.

Mr. BOYCE. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of Rhode Island. Is it in order, Mr. Speaker, to move for the reading of the petition or protest, so as to satisfy the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, the presentation of the protest having been objected to. It is a matter which cannot come properly before the House at present.

Mr. DAVIS. Does it require the unanimous consent of the House to receive the protest?

The SPEAKER. It does. Such is the rule of the House; and the Chair is here only to execute it.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I think it is a very unjust rule.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

Mr. HIESTER, in accordance with previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions:

Bill to prevent and expose frauds on the Pension Office and on individuals, by providing for the advertisement of the names and residences of pensioners.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce three several bills of a private character, merely with the view that they may be appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the following bills were read a first and second time by their titles, and severally referred, as indicated below:

Bill for the relief of the Pine Grove Academy in Louisiana. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Bill to authorize the issuance of patents for lands to Louisiana in certain cases. Referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Bill to confirm the claims of William H. Henderson, and the heirs of Robert Henderson, to five hundred acres of land in the De Bastrop grant. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce joint resolutions from the Legislature of the State of Alabama.

There being no objection, the resolutions were received and read.

The resolutions instruct their Senators, and request their Representatives in Congress, to use all proper means for the repeal or suspension of all duties and restrictions upon the importation of foreign rails, that have been or hereafter may be required for railroads, now in progress of construction, or that may be constructed during the next ten years within the United States.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask permission to offer the following resolution, in regard to their reference:

Resolved, That the joint resolutions of the State of Alabama, in reference to the duties on railroad iron, be referred to a select committee of nine, who shall report upon the propriety of modifying the said duties and extending the credit thereon.

Mr. JONES, of New York. I object to the resolution, and am opposed to any select committee.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Then I move to suspend the rules, to enable me to introduce it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inform the gentleman that such motion cannot be made except on Mondays.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table, and printed.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF CADETS.

The SPEAKER. The proposition before the body is the motion to commit a joint resolution, explanatory of the law to regulate the number of cadets to be appointed to the Military Academy at West Point.

Mr. HAVEN. As the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PRESTON,] who made the motion to refer, is not in his place, and as the House had a pretty general understanding of the object of that motion, I hope the House will vote it down, and pass the resolution.

Mr. BOCK. Cannot the gentleman from Kentucky withdraw that motion?

Mr. HAVEN. He is not present.

Mr. BISSELL. The Committee on Military Affairs had a meeting this morning, and had the subject under consideration. They came to the conclusion to support this resolution before the House, and to urge upon the House to pass it at once. They did this under the conviction that such a resolution was necessary; and therefore, if it be referred to them, as proposed by the pending motion, made by the gentleman from Kentucky yesterday, they would report it back at the first opportunity.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask for the reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read [as published yesterday] by the Clerk.

Mr. HAVEN. The gentleman from Kentucky is now in the House, and, with the consent of the House, he can withdraw his motion, and call the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. PRESTON. I concur in the suggestion of the gentleman, and ask leave to withdraw the motion I made yesterday, and to substitute therefor a call for the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

No objection being made, the motion was withdrawn.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The main question being, "Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time?" it was put, and decided in the affirmative.

The joint resolution having been engrossed, it was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOCK moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

SUPERINTENDENCE OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have a petition in my hands that has been submitted to me, relating to a subject which has been already referred to a special committee. Not knowing whether it can be referred under the rules, I desire to offer it in the House, and have it referred to the special committee having charge of the subject relating to military superintendence over the construction of the public buildings. It is a petition signed by two hundred and twenty-two working men, who disapprove of the superintendence, by military men, of the construction of any of the public buildings of the Government, or in any of the workshops or armories of the United States.

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to refer it under the rules.

Mr. FLORENCE. I was not aware of that fact, and hence I called the attention of the Speaker to the subject. I, therefore, send it to the Clerk's desk that it may be referred, under the rules, to the special committee having charge of the subject to which I have referred.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DISNEY. I trust that the House will vote down the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee. The Wisconsin land bill is in such a condition that the Committee on Public Lands cannot report anything else until that is disposed of.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw his motion. I desire to offer a resolution to close debate upon the deficiency bill in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Such a resolution would be in order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I offer, then, the following resolution:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, on bill of the House (No. 271) to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1854, shall cease in two hours after its consideration is resumed, if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion thereon; and the committee shall then proceed to vote upon such amendments as may be pending, or offered to the same, and shall report it to the House with such amendments as may be agreed to by the committee.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution; and, a division being had, there were—ayes 95, noes not counted.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAVEN. Is there a motion now pending before the House?

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending, made by the gentleman from Tennessee, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken upon Mr. JONES's motion; and, a division being had, there were—ayes 68, noes 75.

Mr. KERR. I demand tellers upon the motion. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and CHURCHWELL were appointed.

The question was then put; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 86.

Mr. LETCHER. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I call for the regular order of business.

ACCOUNTS OF A. BOYD HAMILTON.

Mr. HAVEN. I believe it is in order for me to call up the motion I made a few days ago, and have it disposed of. I refer to a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution passed transferring the auditing of the accounts of A. Boyd Hamilton from the Clerk of the House, the Secretary of the Senate, and the clerk of the Committee on Printing, to the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury. I understand the resolution has passed the Senate; and, after consultation with those who were interested in making the motion, I am satisfied this is the best disposition than can be made of the business. I therefore call up that motion to reconsider, and move that it be laid upon the table.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Mr. CHASTAIN. Would it be in order now to move again that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order.

Mr. CHASTAIN. Then I submit that motion.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then put; and the motion was disagreed to.

WISCONSIN RAILROAD BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on committing the following bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union: "An act granting a portion of the public lands to the State of Wisconsin, to aid in the construction of a railroad and branch road in said State." The previous question has been demanded.

Mr. DEAN. I moved the previous question, and I desire to know what will be the effect of it?

The SPEAKER. The effect will be to bring the House first to vote on the motion to commit, and, if the bill is not committed, then upon the amendments, and then upon the engrossment of the bill for a third reading.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to inquire if the bill is open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. Not until the demand for the previous question has been disposed of.

Mr. WASHBURN. If the demand for the previous question is sustained, it will not then be open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will not be.

Mr. DEAN. There are amendments pending. Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the previous question.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to have the yeas and nays on the second. The gentleman can have the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, but not upon the second.

The previous question received a second.

The question then was on ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. CUTTING. I ask the friends of the bill if they will, by unanimous consent, adopt the amendment to this bill that was voted by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union into the Minnesota bill?

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I call for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ASHE asked to be excused from voting, as he paired off with the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] on this bill, as well as the Minnesota railroad bill, which was up last week for consideration. It is well known that he is opposed, in principle, to all of these bills; and if he had felt at liberty to vote, he would have voted, on the latter occasion, with his colleague, [Mr. CRAIG,] who opposed the original bill, as also its amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would ask the Chair what will be the first question, if the call for the previous question be sustained, and the main question ordered to be now put?

The SPEAKER. The first question will then be on the motion to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken on ordering the main question to be now put; and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 107, nays 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abernethy, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Banks, Barksdale, Bennett, Benson, Bissell, Bock, Boyce, Breckinridge, Campbell, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chase, Churchill, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Cook, Corwin, Crocker, Cullom, Cumming, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dean, De Witt, Disney, Dowdell, Dunbar, Eastman, Edmonds, Ellison, English, Farley, Florence, Gamble, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hendricks, Henn, Hiester, Houston, Hughes, Ingersoll, Roland Jones, Knox, Lamb, Lane, Latham, Lindley, Lindsey, Macdonald, McDougall, McMullin, Macey, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Noble, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Packer, Peck, John Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Ready, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Sage, Sapp, Seward, Shannon, Samuel A. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Trout, Tweed, Upham, Walbridge, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, and Yates—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Belcher, Bridges, Brooks, Carpenter, Caskey, Chastain, Cox, Cutting, Dent, Dick, Dickinson, Drumm, Eddy, Edgerton, Flagler, Franklin, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Grey, Aaron Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Hibbard, Hill, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Kerr, Kurtz, Letcher, Lilly, McCulloch, McNair, McQueen, Matteson, Maurice, May, Mayall, Middlesworth, Millson, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Bishop Perkins, Powell, Pratt, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Reese, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Seymour, Shaw, Shower, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, Snodgrass, Richard H. Stanton, Andrew Stuart, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walley, Israel Washburn, Wells, and Zollcoffer—70.

So the main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. COBB. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be put, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to say a word or two.

The SPEAKER. The question arises whether the gentleman has the right to address the House at this stage of the proceedings. The question now is on referring the bill.

Mr. DISNEY. So I understand, and I think that my right to address the House under the rule, as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, is unquestionable.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think that the practice has been heretofore to first take the vote on the question of commitment.

Mr. DISNEY. If the motion to commit the bill be agreed to, what right have I then?

Mr. JONES. Then you have the right to close the debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. In other words, the gentleman's right, as chairman of the committee which reported this bill, to close the debate, is carried from the House to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DISNEY. On the question to commit under a different ruling; I would be entitled to speak. It is important something should be said before the question is taken on the motion to refer.

Mr. JONES. Suppose the gentleman speaks now, and the bill is then sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, he would be entitled to close the debate there also. The uniform practice has been, in my recollection, that if the motion to refer is agreed to, the debate closes in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and if it is voted down, then he speaks on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. DISNEY. The main question has been ordered to be now put. The main question is the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which has been argued; and I, of necessity, compelled to wait until argument was offered in favor of that motion. I was compelled to wait until the House had exhausted itself in favor of that motion, before my right to reply can occur. Under a different ruling I am deprived of all right to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The rule of the House in reference to the question is as follows:

"No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House or in Committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee, may open and close the debate; provided, that when debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed in Committee five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer."

The SPEAKER. Whether, in contemplation of this rule, the debate is closed on referring the bill, will be the question for the House to determine. The Chair thinks that under any other construction than that which he has given to it, the gentleman from Ohio would have the right to close the debate some half dozen of times, perchance, on the bill. The gentleman will perceive that he does not lose his right, even if the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole, as he has a right, under the rule, to close the debate there.

Mr. DISNEY. But suppose this bill should not be committed—what then?

The SPEAKER. Should the bill not be committed, then the gentleman's right to close is clear on ordering the bill to be engrossed, or on its passage, just as he may choose.

Mr. DISNEY. Well, I will not insist on the point; but I say this: that if the motion to commit be carried, it will be fatal to the bill; and I therefore trust that the House—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" all over the Hall.]

The SPEAKER. The question now is on ordering the bill to be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CUTTING. I submit to the friends of the bill, whether or not, before the question on the motion to commit is taken, they will assent to my submitting this amendment to their bill: That no patent shall issue until twenty continuous miles of this road are completed, and so on? It will be observed, that unless the amendment is accepted now there will be no opportunity whatever to amend this bill except in Committee of the Whole. And if the friends of the bill refuse now to allow it to be perfected, their refusal only drives the House, if they desire this amendment, to vote for the proposition to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DISNEY. I am desired to say, by the immediate friends of the bill—I mean by those gentlemen who are most interested in its fate—that they have no sort of objection to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CUTTING.] And I will add, that, in my humble opinion, it is a very small affair. I repeat, that I am desired to say the friends of the bill agree to accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Then, if there be no objection to the amendment it will be inserted as part of the bill.

Mr. OLDS. I object. I want the bill to go to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is on referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative, there being—yeas 86, nays 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Belcher, Bennett, Bockock, Bridges, Carpenter, Caskie, Chastain, Colquitt, Cox, Craige, Crocker, Cutting, Dent, Dick, Dickinson, Dowdell, Drum, Edmonds, Elliott, Ellison, Faulkner, Flagler, Franklin, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Grey, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Hibbard, Howe, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kurtz, Letcher, Lilly, McCulloch, McMullin, McQueen, Maurice, May, Middlesworth, Milson, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Oids, Packer, Bishop Perkins, Powell, Pratt, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, Reese, David Ritchie, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Seward, Seymour, Shaw, Simmons, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, Snodgrass, Andrew Stuart, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walley, Israel Washburn, Wells, and Zollicoffer—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Banks, Barksdale, Benson, Bissell, Boyce, Breckinridge, Brooks, Bugg, Campbell, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chase, Churchwell, Clark, Cobb, Cook, Corwin, Cullom, Cumming, John G. Davis, Dawson, De Witt, Disney, Dunbar, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, English, Everhart, Farley, Florence, Gamble, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Henn, Hill, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, Roland Jones, Knox, Lamb, Latham, Lindley, Lindsley, McDougall, Macy, Matteson, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Noble, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Peck, John Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Richardson, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Sage, Sapp, Shannon, Shower, Samuel A. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tweed, Upham, Walbridge, Walker, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, and Yates—95.

So the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was not agreed to.

Mr. DISNEY. I am desired now, by the friends of this bill, to request the unanimous consent of the House to the adoption of the amendment suggested and offered a while ago by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CUTTING.]

Mr. OLDS. I withdraw my objection to it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York will be incorporated in the bill.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be reported.

Mr. HOWE. I object to its incorporation in the bill, except another amendment which I propose to offer be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will first hear this proposition read; and then that which he proposes to submit may be also read.

The Clerk then reported the amendment, as follows:

After section 4, insert as the 5th section:

And be it further enacted, That the lands to be appropriated to said State shall be disposed of only in manner following, that is to say: No title shall vest in said State of Wisconsin, nor shall any patent issue for any portion of the lands hereinbefore mentioned, until a continuous length of twenty miles of said road be completed through the lands hereby granted. And when the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that any twenty continuous miles of said road are completed as aforesaid, then a patent shall issue for a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections, and included within the continuous length of twenty miles of said road. And so, from time to time, patents shall issue in like manner on the completion of every additional twenty continuous miles of said road until it is completed; when patents shall issue for the remaining lands not already conveyed. And if said road be not completed within ten years, no further sales shall be made; and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this amendment will be received to be voted upon in its proper order as a part of the bill. The bill will be so modified.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to ask the friends of this bill if they will accept the following amendment also?

Several MEMBERS. Read it.

The Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

"That the money arising from the sales of the reserved alternate sections be divided among the several States of the Union in the ratio of their Federal representation."

Several MEMBERS objected.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is objected to. It is therefore out of order.

Mr. SEWARD. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the bill is not amendable now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so decides. The bill is not amendable, unless by unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. SEWARD. Then what is the effect of the previous question?

The SPEAKER. By the express rule of the House the previous question operates first on the motion to commit the bill, then on the amendments pending, then on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. GREY. I would inquire of the Chair, now that the House has refused to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Howe,] if it is in order for me to object to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CUTTING?]

The SPEAKER. It is too late to object, the House having already accepted it without objection.

Mr. DISNEY. I shall not avail myself of the privilege accorded to me by the rules of the House, to occupy an hour in closing this debate. I am too anxious to get the bill out of its present situation, and out of the way; for, as long as it remains where it is, it prevents all reports from committees of this House. Seeing the evident disposition of the House, if I felt so disposed, I would not trespass upon their time.

But there is another and more cogent reason which governs me. I am physically unable to say what I should like under other circumstances to have said. Permit me to say, once for all, to the House, that in relation to this matter of railroads, the most singular confusion of ideas, in reference to facts and principles, seems to have fastened itself—perhaps irremovably—but for the present, at least, upon the minds of some gentlemen upon this floor.

Why, the whole foundation of grants of this sort is to be found in the fact that the reserved sections will be enhanced in value. While in relation to this point, positive figures, dates, and localities have been paraded by the official officers of this Government, yet gentlemen, wise in their own judgment, refuse to believe. With such words are powerless, and there is no such thing as argument.

I should like to have gone on at some length in reply to the singular speech delivered the other day by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] as illustrating precisely the fact of which I have spoken.

Mr. LETCHER, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me a word?

Mr. DISNEY. I do not like these interruptions.

Mr. LETCHER. I think the gentleman should be as civil to me as I was to him the other day, and to all the friends of the bill. I then allowed them all to interrupt me.

I understood the gentleman from Ohio to make a statement upon this floor, that under these railroad grants the Government gets as much land, in quantity, as is given to the railroad companies.

Mr. DISNEY. As much what?

Mr. LETCHER. That the Government reserves under these railroad grants, precisely the same amount of land that the railroad companies get, and that such land is doubled in price. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio correctly?

Mr. DISNEY. I said that the foundation of the right to make grants of this sort was to be found in the enhanced value given to the residue of the public domain, in consequence of the improvements made by virtue of these grants. And to sustain that proposition, I pledge myself—not now, but hereafter—to prove it to the gentleman's content.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman answer the question I have presented? I so understood him to say the other day, and I understand him to say so now.

Mr. DISNEY. I said that the whole domain in that particular locality was enhanced.

Mr. LETCHER. That is not the question to which I called the gentleman's attention.

If the gentleman will pardon me, I will read a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It is as follows:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, March 1, 1854.

SIR: In compliance with your verbal request of this morning to be furnished with a statement showing the quantity of land donated along the Illinois Central railroad, and the quantity reserved to the United States, subject to the double minimum price, I have the honor to state that the quantity donated, &c., as above, is as follows:

States.	Quantity donated.	Quantity reserved, &c.
Illinois.....	2,595,053 acres.	1,223,921 acres.
Alabama.....	419,528 "	*167,045 "
